WHAT UNCLE SAM SHOULD DO.

Notes and Clippings.

A FRIEND writes us to be informed whether the pope is a fool or a rascal. Personally, he is neither. But he is the head of the most knavish, despotic, cruel, selfish, tricky, and brutal organization in the world. His only companion is the czar of Russia, the head of the other branch of the Catholic church.

DURING the recent floods in Japan, 2,419 persons were killed and 155 were wounded; 90,000 were deprived of the necessaries of life; 50,000 houses were swept away or rendered uninhabitable; 150,000 acres of agricultural land with their crops were laid waste; 6,000 bridges were carried away, and hundreds of miles of roads were destroyed. The Lord doesn't seem to care much for the heathen.

THE New York Truth asks: "If a faith curist prefers to take the chances of prayer and laying on of hands, instead of the equal uncertainty of drugs, has he not the right to use his own judgment and to suffer or prosper thereby, so long as the experiment is tried by his free consent and not forced upon him?" and goes on to say: "Whether a seer be clad in foul sheepskin and diet on ordure in Judea, or wears an old shawl and a shiny silk dress and livs on fried fish in Sixth avenue, matters not—their pretensions are the same—to foretell events. Whether a healer trusts in calomel or prayer—the effect of both being mere guess-work—is surely not a matter for courts of justice to decide. The only question should be one of free will. No one should be forced to take physic, whether spiritual or material." That is all right enough when only the faith curist's own life is at stake, but what shall be done when the faithist neglects his child and allows it to die in obedience to the "will of God," when human aid could save its life? Murders must be prevented, if possible, and punished if committed, not only when the deed is done by brutal force, but also when it is done by brutally religious neglect.

THE Brazilian correspondent of the Mail and Express of this city writes from Sao Paulo: "It is said that in a few days will be decreed civil marriage, the secularization of the cemeteries, the separation of church and state, and that the Catholic priests now paid by the state will continue for life to receive their salaries. Manifestations, processions, Vivas a republica, the singing of the Marseillaise, continue. Corporations, companies of ladies, come from neighboring cities to wait on the government. The most imposing was the procession of the factories. Five thousand men, women, and children of different nationalities, the Italians outnumbering them all, with flags, lanterns, and torches, marched through the streets accompanied by several music bands. A Positivist lawyer was chosen to make the speech, and he proclaimed his Positivist proclivities and announced that the philosophy of the republic was the Positiv philosophy of Comte. The name of God is never mentioned in any of the proclamations and decrees issued by either the central or state governments, and no allusion is made of the hand of providence in bringing about the peaceful change of form of government. Men are exalted as high as possible, and the prospects are that the religious atmosphere will be more or less that of France. Benjamin Constant, the secretary of war, of French descent, is an ardent Positivist, and, being in a high position, will find many followers."

THE Chinese Recorder of Shanghai contains a paper on the "Life and Writings of the God of Literature." This being, it appears, lived through seventeen different lives as scholar and official, although the records of only nine lives now exist, the remaining eight never having been preserved. In his own person he completed the perfection of the three religions of China. One of his works contains a chapter on ghosts and men, of which the following is the substance: "A ghost is the corrupt part of man, and man is the pure part of a ghost. A man can be a ghost, and a ghost can be a man. The man and the ghost are mutually related; why separate man and ghost? The ghost becomes a man; then man must become a ghost. If a man does not become a ghost he will surely be able to perfect manhood. It is difficult for a ghost to become a man, because it has fallen to ghosthood, and because it has lost manhood. A man is a ghost; a ghost is a man; but all men are not ghosts, neither is every ghost a man." This is about as lucid and reasonable as the recent Episcopalian discussion on the ridiculous question of whether the holy ghost proceeds from the son as well as from the father.

GEORGE SHUFELDT has been figuring up for the Sun's readers an approximate estimate of the population of hell. He finds: "In round numbers the earth has a population of 1,300,000,000, of whom 300,000,000 are professed Christians, the other 1,000,000,000 being Mohammedans, Buddhists, Jews, pagans, and heathen. The whole race was condemned to eternal punishment for the sin of Adam. This was the fall of man, from which there was and is no redemption save through the death of Christ. Biblical chronology give the earth a period of 6,000 years. From Adam's time to Christ was 4,000 years, during which period no human souls were saved. The population may then hav averaged 1,000,000,000. Three generations, or 3,000,000,000, pass away in each century. Forty centuries, therefore, consigned 120,000,000,000 of men to eternal fire, and, for all we know, they are there now. In the 1,900 years which hav elapsed since the birth of Christ 57,000,000,000 more of human beings hav lived and died. If all the Christians, nominal and real, who hav ever lived on the face of the earth hav been saved, they would not number more than eighteen thousand millions. Now, if we deduct this latter number from the grand total of one hundred and seventy-seven thousand millions, we find one hundred and fifty-nine thousand millions of souls who are suffering the torments of hell fire, as against the eighteen thousand millions who hav escaped. But this is not the whole truth. Nobody believes that more than ten per cent of the professed Christians are saved. Calvinists themselvs say that the elect are few. If this is a fact, heaven contains but eighteen hundred millions, against a population in hell of one hundred and seventy-five thousand millions." But what a horrible scheme of theology it is that thus crowds a place of eternal torment!

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

CHAPTER XII.—Concluded.

Testimony of Friends and Acquaintances of Lincoln Who Knew Him in Illinois.

Mr. Murdoch states that in connection with this incident Lincoln was charged "with turning sacred subjects into ridicule," and he apologizes for and attempts to palliate this levity. But almost daily Lincoln indulged in jokes at the expense of the Bible and Christianity, many of them ten-fold more sacrilegious in their character than this trifling incident related by Mr. Murdoch. If the scrupulously pious considered this simple jest, uttered in the midst of a mixed crowd, irreverent, what would hav been their horror could they hav listened to some of his remarks made when alone with a skeptical boon companion? With Christians and with strangers he was generally guarded in his speech, lest he should giv offense; but with his unbelieving friends, up to the end of his career, his keenest shafts of wit were not infrequently aimed at the religion of his day. This shows that the popular faith had no more sacredness for Lincoln, the president, in Washington, than it had for Lincoln, the farmer's boy, who mocked and mimicked it in Indiana, or Lincoln, the lawyer, who scoffed at it and argued against it in Illinois.

Maunsell B. Field.

Mr. Field, who had met nearly all the noted characters of his day, both of Europe and America, in his "Memories of Many Men," has this significant sentence respecting Lincoln:

> Mr. Lincoln was entirely deficient in what the phrenologists call reverence [veneration].

This made it easy for him to emancipate himself from the slavery of priestcraft and become and remain a Freethinker. Professor Beall, one of the ablest of living phrenological writers, says:

> No man can "enjoy religion," as the Methodists express it, unless he has well developed veneration and wonder (The Brain and the Bible, p. 109).
> All those who rebel against any form of government which in childhood they were taught to revere, must of necessity do so in opposition to the faculty of veneration. Thus it is obvious that the less one possesses of the conservativ restraining faculties, the more easily he becomes a rebel or an infidel to that which his reason condemns. On the other hand, the profoundly conscientious and reverential man, who sincerely regards unbelief as a sin, of course instinctivly antagonizes every skeptical thought, and is thus likely to remain a slave to the religion learned at his mother's knee (Ibid, p. 228).

Mr. Field also relates the following anecdote of Lincoln:

> I was once in Mr. Lincoln's company when a sectarian controversy arose. He himself looked very grave, and made no observation until all the others had finished what they had to say. Then with a twinkle of the eye, he remarked that he preferred the Episcopalians to every other sect, because they are equally indifferent to a man's religion and his politics.

Harriet Beecher Stowe.

The noted author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" had several interviews with the president. She wrote an article on him which has been cited in proof of his "deeply religious nature." But if her words prove anything, they prove that he was not an evangelical Christian. They are as follows:

> But Almighty God has granted to him that clearness of vision which he givs to the true-hearted, and enabled him to set his honest foot in that promised land of freedom which is to be the patrimony of all men, black and white; and from henceforth nations shall rise up and call him blessed. We believe he has never made any religious profession, but we see evidence that in passing through this dreadful national crisis he has been forced by the very anguish of the struggle to look upward, where any rational creature must look for support. No man in this agony has suffered more and deeper, albeit with a dry, weary, patient pain, that seemed to some like insensibility. "Whichever way it ends," he said to the writer, "I hav the impression that I shan't last long after it's over" (Every-Day Life of Lincoln, pp. 575, 576).

Mrs. Stowe was herself an orthodox Christian communicant, but her store of good sense was too great to allow her to inflict her religious notions upon the unbelieving president, and, as a consequence, she did not see him rush out of the room with a Bible under his arm to—I was going to say—pray God to deliver him from an intolerable nuisance.

That the mighty burden which pressed upon Lincoln made him a sadder and a more serious man at Washington than he had been before is true. Christians are always mistaking sadness for penitence and seriousness for piety, and so they claim that he experienced a change of heart.

Hon. John P. Usher.

Christians and Theists are wont to speak of Lincoln's constant and firm reliance upon God. But it is a little remarkable that in the preparation of his greatest work he did not rely upon God. In the supreme moments of his life he forgot God. Dr. Barrows says:

> When he wrote his immortal Proclamation he invoked upon it . . . "the gracious favor of Almighty God."

When he wrote his immortal Proclamation he had no thought of God. Judge Usher, a member of his cabinet, tells us how God came to be invoked:

> In the preparation of the final Proclamation of Emancipation, of January 1, 1863, Mr. Lincoln manifested great solicitude. He had his original draft printed and furnished each member of his cabinet with a copy, with the request that each should examin, criticise, and suggest any amendments that occurred to them. At the next meeting of the cabinet Mr. Chase said: "This paper is of the utmost importance—greater than any state paper ever made by this government. A paper of so much importance, and involving the liberties of so many people, ought, I think, to make some reference to Deity. I do not observe anything of the kind in it." Mr. Lincoln said: "No; I overlooked it. Some reference to Deity must be inserted. Mr. Chase, won't you make a draft of what you think ought to be inserted?" Mr. Chase promised to do so, and at the next meeting presented the following: "And upon this Act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God" (Reminiscences of Lincoln, pp. 91, 92).

Frederick Douglas.

Abraham Lincoln believed in a supreme being, but he did not believe in the God of Christians. The God of Christians was to him the most hideous monster that the imagination of man had ever conceived. There were two doctrins taught in connection with this deity which he especially abhorred—the doctrin of endless punishment, and the doctrin of vicarious atonement. That the innocent should suffer for the guilty—that God should permit his sinless son to be put to a cruel death to atone for the sins of wicked men—was to him an act of the most infamous injustice. His whole nature rebelled against the idea. Frederick Douglas narrates an incident which, while it has no direct reference to this theological doctrin, yet tends to disclose his abhorrence of the idea. Mr. Douglas was engaged in recruiting colored troops and visited the president for the purpose of securing from him a pledge that colored soldiers would be allowed the same privileges accorded white soldiers. As the Confederate government had declared that they would be treated as insurgents, he also urged upon him the necessity of retaliating, if colored prisoners were put to death. But to the latter proposition Lincoln would not listen. Mr. Douglas says:

> I shall never forget the benignant expression of his face, the tearful look of his eye and the quiver of his voice, when he deprecated a resort to retaliatory measures. He said he could not take men out and kill them in cold blood for what was done by others. If he could get hold of the persons who were guilty of killing the colored prisoners in cold blood, the case would be different, but he could not kill the innocent for the guilty" (Reminiscences of Lincoln, pp. 188, 189).

Hon. Warren Chase.

In 1888, I received a letter from Warren Chase pertaining to Lincoln's religious belief. Mr. Chase was acquainted with Lincoln in Washington. His letter has been mislaid, but I recall the principal points in it, which are as follows: 1. Lincoln was not a believer in Christianity; 2. He was much interested in the phenomena of Spiritualism.

Hon. A. J. Grover.

A. J. Grover, a life-long reformer, an old-time Abolitionist, an able advocate of human liberty, and a personal friend and admirer of Lincoln, in a letter written April 13, 1888, sends me the following as his testimony:

> Mr. Lincoln was not a religious man in the church sense. He was an Agnostic. He did not believe in the Bible as the infallible word of God. He believed that nature is God's word, given to all men in a universal language which is equally accessible to all, if all are equally intelligent. That this great lesson, God's word in his works, is infinit, and that men hav only learned a very little of it, and hav yet the most to learn. That the religions of all ages and peoples are only very feeble and imperfect attempts to solve the great problems involved in nature and her laws. Mr. Lincoln heartily disliked the narrow and silly pretensions of the church and priesthood who now falsely claim him, as they do Washington, Franklin, and others.
> I knew Mr. Lincoln from the Douglas campaign in Illinois in 1858 until his death, and I never heard him on any occasion use a single pious expression in the sense of the church—not a word that indicated that he believed in the church theology. But I hav heard him use many expressions that indicated that he did not know much, or pretend to know much, and had no settled convictions concerning the great questions that theology deals so flippantly with, and pretends to know all about. And I know of my own knowledge that the claim the church now sets up that he was a Christian is false—as false as it is in regard to Washington.

Writing to me again under date of Jan. 12, 1889, Mr. Grover says:

> I knew Mr. Lincoln in Illinois and in Washington. I was in the War office, for a time, in a department which had charge of the President's books, so-called. I met him in passing between the White House and the buildings then occupied by the War Department, almost every day. I often had to go to Mr. Stanton's office, and hav often seen Mr. Lincoln there. I frequently had to go to the White House to see him. It was known to all of his acquaintances that he was a Liberal or Rationalist.

Nicolay and Hay's "Life of Lincoln."

As Colonel Lamon's "Life" covers but a part of Lincoln's career, and as Mr. Herndon's "Life" deals more with his private life than with his public history, the biography of Lincoln that is likely to be accepted as the standard authority, is the work written by his private secretaries, Col. John G. Nicolay and Col. John Hay, which for the past two years has been appearing in the Century Magazine. The publication of this work has at the present writing not been completed, but in the chapter on "Lincoln and the Churches," which appeared in the Century for August, 1889, the religious phase of Lincoln's character has been presented. In dealing with this question the authors hav carefully avoided the rock upon which Lamon's "Life" was wrecked, and at the same time hav refrained from repeating the misrepresentations of Holland and Arnold. They do not offend the church by openly declaring that Lincoln was an Infidel; neither do they outrage truth by asserting that he was a Christian. They affirm that during the latter years of his life he recognized a "superior power," but they do not intimate that he recognized Jesus Christ as this power, or any part of it, nor that he accepted the Bible as a special revelation of this power. In the following passage they impliedly deny both his alleged Atheism and his alleged orthodoxy:

> We hav no purpose of attempting to formulate his creed; we question if he himself ever did so. There hav been swift witnesses who, judging from expressions uttered in his callow youth, hav called him an atheist, and others who, with the most laudable intentions, hav remembered improbable conversations which they bring forward to prove at once his orthodoxy and their own intimacy with him.

As it is not claimed that Lincoln was an Atheist, especially during the last years of his life, the above can very properly be brought forward in support of the negativ of this question. In the last clause it is intended by the authors to administer a sarcastic rebuke to such witnesses as Brooks, Willets, and Vincent, as well as deny the truthfulness of their statements.

Judge James M. Nelson.

The last and in some respects the most important of our Washington witnesses is Judge James M. Nelson. Judge Nelson, for many years, has been a resident of New York, but he formerly lived in Kentucky and Illinois, Lincoln's nativ and adopted states. He is a son of Thomas Pope Nelson, a distinguished member of Congress from Kentucky, and the first United States minister to Turkey. His great-grandfather was Thomas Nelson, Jr., a signer of the Declaration of Independence from Virginia. He was long and intimately acquainted with Lincoln, both in Illinois and Washington. About the close of 1886, or early in 1887, Judge Nelson published his "Reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln" in the Louisville, Ky., Times. In reference to Lincoln's religious opinions, he says:

> In religion, Mr. Lincoln was about of the same belief as Bob Ingersoll, and there is no account of his ever having changed. He went to church a few times with his family while he was President, but so far as I hav been able to find out he remained an unbeliever.

"Mr. Lincoln in his younger days wrote a book," says Judge Nelson, "in which he endeavored to prove the fallacy of the plan of salvation and the divinity of Christ."

I hav yet another passage from Judge Nelson's "Reminiscences" to present, a passage which, more than anything else in this volume, perhaps, is calculated to provoke the wrath of Christian claimants. To lend an air of plausibility to their claims these claimants are continually citing expressions of a seemingly semi-pious character occasionally to be met with in his speeches and state papers. These expressions, in a measure accounted for by Mr. Herndon, Colonel Lamon, and others, are still further explained by a revelation from his own lips. Judge Nelson says:

> I asked him once about his fervent Thanksgiving message and twitted him with being an unbeliever in what was published. "Oh," said he, "that is some of Seward's nonsense, and it pleases the fools."

John E. Remsburg.

A newspaper of Washington, D. C., in its issue of the 15th ult., contained the following extract from Belva Lockwood's lecture at the Methodist church:

> "Germany's idea of education," she said, "is to make good fighters. Everybody there drinks beer and the students still fight duels. It might be said that some of the Germans are beer barrels in the morning and barrels of beer at night. The punishment for violating the rules of some of the social clubs is frequently a sentence to drink beer till the chairman givs the drinker permission to stop. Students convicted of fighting duels are confined in solitary cells, where they hav to sit on what seemed to be the hardest of hard-wood chairs."

As an American citizen of German birth, I beg leave to state the following in answer to this article: It is true that wine and beer are the principal social beverages in Germany, yet the Germans, both in Europe and in other parts of the world, wherever they may liv, consider avoidance of drunkenness as a matter of self-respect. The assertion branding some of the Germans as beer barrels in the morning and as barrels of beer at night, is as gratuitous an insult as an assertion would be labeling some of the Anglo-Americans as whisky bottles in the morning and bottles of whisky at night. As stated, the Germans in Europe drink beer, physically to be benefited thereby. Yet that is not their sole employment or only occupation. They are also engaged in other pursuits. It is a well-known fact that the German nation has helped and is constantly helping to promote civilization as much as any other nation on the globe, the American people not excepted.

As the lady having delivered the lecture referred to, was a late candidate for president of the United States, the following remarks may be added in this respect.

The women of Germany are as amiable, as intelligent, and in the performance of their household duties as faithful, as the women of the United States of America. Promoting the welfare and the happiness of the men there, they are, of course, honored and respected by the latter. Family life, the basis of human society, is nowhere truer than in the German fatherland. It is a sad fact that, politically, Germany is not a free country. Yet, also to the German people, the hour of freedom will strike some day—the sooner, the better. When that happy event will hav occurred, the women of the German fatherland will doubtless not clamor for "woman suffrage." They will doubtless see that the electiv franchise involves both the privilege to vote for, and the duty to hold, public office. They will doubtless be aware of the fact that, on the whole, the duties of a married woman, imposed upon her by nature, are incompatible with the duties of a public electiv office; and that the fundamental law or laws—the national constitution and the state constitutions—of a free country, cannot pay any special attention either to young and old maids, or to widows and divorced women. Modesty, women's noblest virtue, will doubtless teach them not to look down upon the male portion of the German nation as upon imbecils unable to attend to the public affairs of their country. Modesty doubtless will also prevent them from insisting upon it that the ship of state of the German republic shall be steered by female hands, in order to be in safe hands. J. G. HERTWIG.

Washington, D. C., Dec. 10, 1889.

The Rich Man and Lazarus.

Christians are never tired of representing their God Jesus as the very quintessence of gentleness, patience, sympathy, and mercy, as "full of the milk of human kindness." "Did he not," ask the Christians, "voluntarily vacate a position equal in grandeur and sublimity to that occupied by his almighty father in order to take upon himself the consequences of human frailty and sin, and to suffer in his own person the punishment due to the poor family of Adam?" "I don't know," answers the Agnostic. "If he did, however, he was kinder than his father, who must hav been an implacable monster to ever dream of inflicting upon humanity everlasting suffering for the petty offense committed by a very ancient ancestor." This claim of Christ's gentleness and mercy can only be sustained by a complete and wilful blindness to the grosser and meaner sides of his character. He was very passionate and, when thoroughly aroused, very ill-mannered and brutal. At the tender age of twelve years he broke the fifth commandment, and told his anxious and loving parents to mind their own business and allow him to wander in a strange city at his own sweet will. On one occasion he cursed a fig-tree because it did not bear fruit immediately on his approach toward it. If it had been the time for figs and none were on when he was hungry, thirsty, and weary, one can sympathize with him in his disappointment, but to curse it—to wither it—when it was true to the very laws which he, as almighty God, had given it, was an act of childish petulance and folly, and reminds one of the silly boy who kicked the wheelbarrow because he fell over it. On another occasion he let loose a lot of devils and permitted them to get, by some mysterious means, into a herd of swine. These pigs became so spiritualized that they hurled themselvs into the sea. Although the "cattle on a thousand hills are his" he never made any compensation to the poor owner of these "unclean beasts."

Whilst these incidents cast a little side light on the alleged perfectness and uniform gentleness of Christ's character, the teachings of the parable of "the rich man and Lazarus" prove him to be devoid of every humane sentiment.

M. Renan, in his "Life of Christ," points out that Christ's early ministry was amongst the poor, and in order to popularize his mission he emphasized the ideas that rich men were necessarily bad, and that poor men might be very good; that whilst a rich man might enjoy an immunity from earthly cares he would suffer for it in the "world to come," and that whilst a poor man might endure, "for a brief season," "all the ills which flesh is heir to," he would enjoy in the "world to come" everlasting rest. Such teaching as this was bound to hav a great influence on a people who had long been in political bondage, and it is to be remembered that Syria was then paying one-third of its annual produce in taxes (Draper). There is no doubt that the distribution of wealth affects, in a great measure, social conditions, and, where that distribution is inequitable, the different classes, into which society is conventionally divided, contract habits and modes of life corresponding to their economical state—the rich resort to oppression, and the poor, first, to submission, then to revolt. But to say that the rich man shall be damned eternally, and the poor man—the beggar—blessed eternally is monstrous.

There are eight distinct doctrins laid down in this parable (Luke xvi, 19–31). What are they?

(a) That the rich man went to hell because he was rich (verses 22, 23).
(b) That the poor man went into Abraham's bosom because he was poor (verses 22, 23).
(c) That the inhabitants of hell can see the inhabitants of heaven (verse 23).
(d) That the inhabitants of heaven can hear the wails of agony of the damned (verse 25).
(e) That Abraham, as a type of the settlers in heaven, has lost all pity and is deaf to the cry of suffering (verse 25).
(f) That the gulf between heaven and hell cannot be bridged, and that the efficacy of Christ's atonement does not reach unto the devil's kingdom (verse 26).
(g) That there is more kindness in a damned creature's heart than in the purified soul of a saint (verse 28).
(h) That the ambiguous words of Moses and the prophets are more convincing than the message of a special ambassador from heaven itself (verse 31).

No doubt the "D.D's." would object to this literal interpretation of the parable and would try to read into it some meaning corresponding to the theology of their particular church. Would not this, however, be very presumptuous? Nay, further, would they not be endangering their souls thereby? For it is written—Rev. xxii, 18, 19—"If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book; and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city and from the things which are written in this book."

It is, therefore, clear beyond all question and dispute that the doctrins taught in this parable are an essential part of Christianity, to doubt which is to insure everlasting damnation. A bishop of the English church is reported to hav said at a church convention that Christianity is wholly inapplicable to human society, and any attempt to arrange society on such a basis must end disastrously. The bishop is true in his statement but false in his life. Honesty and Christianity are incompatible. Every Christian has his "mental reservations," but he consoles himself that these "reservations do not extend to essentials." All these things go to show that man is always better than his creed, and if he had no creed at all he would be a better and truer man.

Christians hav an inward belief and an outward practice. The one should be the counterpart of the other, whereas in reality they hav very little in common. The ancients had what they called esoteric and exoteric principles. The former were for the initiated and firm friends of the philosophical master, while the latter were intended for the general public. Perhaps Jesus Christ meant to inculcate this division of ethical principles, but overlooked it from the pressure of other business.

Christians do not believe in the moral guilt attaching to the possession of riches, and it is pretty certain that Christ did not. The parable of the talents clearly proves that Christ not only commended the accumulation of wealth, but advised usury as a good method when no other means were possible. The two men in the parable who made one hundred per cent on the money lent them were invited "to enter into the joy of their lord." But the man who was afraid lest he might lose his master's money in some rash speculation and therefore hid it in the earth, was despoiled of what he had and "cast into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

The doctrins taught in (c) and (d) above referred to, are too horrible to characterize. Every professing Christian knows that such doctrins are revolting to his own nature, and yet he subscribes to churches and institutions which embody such doctrins in their constitutions. It is not enough to say that Christ taught another doctrin on some other occasion. If Christ taught contradictory principles he is merely a ranting pedagog, misleading the ignorant and disgusting the informed. Let any man, refined or brutal, reflect for a moment on what is implied in this doctrin of hell and heaven, and he will instantly banish it from his mind as the expression of some almighty tiger delighting in the agony and unutterable torture of its prey. What parent can witness, unconcernedly, the suffering of his child? Among the millions of fathers what an infinitesimal portion neglect their families! There hav been many women utterly depraved in the eyes of the law and of society, but who hav never been false to the instincts of maternity. How close is the tie that unites mother and child! How deep is the affection of father and son! And yet these bonds may be broken in the world to come—the son suffering the torments of hell with his father smilingly looking on from the serene and beautiful "city of God." If Christians would allow their humanity to assert itself, they would revolt against such a system of "divine government," and declare their intentions to establish a republic if hell were not abolished as an institution. The Bible says, "The prayer of a righteous man availeth much." Then in the name of kindness and love let every righteous Christian go down on his knees and ask God to blot out hell.

It is a little unfortunate that Christ should hav given Abraham as the type of heaven's inhabitants. Abraham may hav been the father of the faithful, but he was, according to the records, a terrible liar. His refusal, however, to send Lazarus to cool the parched tongue of a suffering sinner was quite in keeping with his treatment of his mistress Hagar, a few centuries previous. One would be inclined to believe, from the glowing descriptions which preachers of the gospel giv of heaven, that every resident therein was pure and holy, that the conditions of heaven-life were such as to produce in the saved ones every possible virtue, and that their occupations were confined to glorifying God, ministering to the desires of the saints, and singing praises. This is no doubt what Christians would like, but the parable shows that after centuries of residence in heaven Abraham was the same hardened wretch and cruel coward. Milton says, "A mind in its own place can make a hell of heaven, a heaven of hell;" so it will not be difficult to estimate the prevailing morality of the place where Abraham is the typical citizen.

Every Christian is ashamed of the doctrin of "eternal torments." He finds it difficult to reconcile such a belief with the idea of a merciful God, but comforts his soul with the thought that it does not matter to him, as he has made "his calling and election sure." God's grace is sufficient for him, but when once the dark river is crossed his doom is sealed. Christ made an infinit atonement, but the devil is all-powerful in hell. There is no denying the fact that Christ taught the doctrin of eternal torments, and he who denies it is an Infidel, no matter how cleverly he may hide its brutality.

Strange as it may appear, there is one truly human sentiment in this parable, and Christ puts it in the mouth of the rich man. Even in his agony and suffering the rich man did not forget his brethren. He had five, and although their company might hav been somewhat of a solace he prefers to suffer alone. "Well," says he, "if Lazarus cannot come here, send him to my brethren, lest they, too, come into this place of torment." No, no, no. Old Abraham is obdurate, and coolly refers "the brethren" to "Moses and the prophets."

It is to be regretted that the parable ends at this interesting stage. It is, however, not for poor frail mortals to say how much truth God shall reveal, but how nice it would hav been to hear Abraham quoting Moses and the prophets! Clearly the rich man did not believe that the "ancients" had said much about the subject, for it is to be inferred that he lapsed into eternal silence. Abraham did not wish to refer the brethren to his own biography, and in this he displayed commendable modesty.

How blessed is the reflection that these doctrins cannot be true! How happy is the man whose head and mind are no longer crushed by such barbarous chains! He craves not heaven, he fears not hell. He knows that earth-life can be made bright and glorious by the diffusion of knowledge and the practice of virtue, and that by deeds of kindness and love he may win an immortality in the hearts of his fellows. H. ROWLEY.

THE questions which presented themselvs to the acuter minds of a hundred years ago, were present to the acuter minds who lived hundreds of years before that. . . . But the church had known how to deal with intellectual insurgents, from Abelard in the twelfth century, down to Bruno and Vanini in the seventeenth. They were isolated, and for the most part submissiv; and if they were not, the arm of the church was very long, and her grasp mortal. . . . They [the thinkers] could hav taught Europe earlier than the church allowed it to learn, that the sun does not go around the earth, and that it is the earth that goes round the sun. . . . After the middle of the last century the insurrection against the pretensions of the church, and against the doctrins of Christianity, was marked in one of its most important phases by a new, and more significant feature. . . . It was an advance both in knowledge and in moral motiv. . . . The philosophical movement was represented by Diderot [leading the Encyclopedist circle.] . . . Broadly stated, the great central moral of it was this: that human nature is good, that the world is capable of being made a desirable abiding-place, and that the evil of the world is the fruit of bad education and bad institutions. This cheerful doctrin now strikes on the ear as a commonplace and a truism. A hundred years ago in France it was a wonderful gospel, and the beginning of a new dispensation. . . . Into what fresh and unwelcome sunlight it brought the articles of the old theology. . . . Every social improvement since has been the outcome of that new doctrin in one form or another. . . . The teaching of the church paints men as fallen and depraved. The deadly chagrin with which churchmen saw the new fabric rising was very natural. . . . The new secular knowledge clashed at a thousand points, alike in letter and spirit, with the old sacred lore. . . . A hundred years ago this perception was vague and indefinit, but there was an unmistakable apprehension that the Catholic idea of womanhood was no more adequate to the facts of life, than Catholic views about science, or popery, or labor, or political order and authority.—Morley.

The American Secular Union.

A recent article in THE TRUTH SEEKER drew from Dr. Foote the following: "I am free to say that the criticism offered in the last TRUTH SEEKER by Mr. J. H. Burnham strikes me as an exhibition of pernicious partisanship with an unnecessarily strong flavor of vituperation." If this has any meaning, it has a "flavor," not of "vituperation," but certainly of prevarication. "Pernicious partisanship" is meaningless in any possible connection with my article. Again, the doctor remarks, "What I object to in the Burnham criticism is the imputation of base motivs to those who voted for Article 4." This is a conclusion that in no way is deducible from my article. I said not a word about the fourth article nor those who voted for it. It is useless to cant in this way, for it will not divert the candid reader from the issue which I made in that article. Such claptrap is not dignified. It is not the words of the constitution that are in discussion. It is the attitude in which the last congress placed itself that merits the use of the terms I used; and I am willing to submit to the Freethinkers of the country, the friends of the cause, personally classed under the American Secular Union. That the doctor or anyone else at that congress had any base motiv, I am not prepared to say. That they intended the inevitable implications I do not say. But I do say that no deeper disgrace could be heaped upon the cause for which our dead heroes fought than the contempt shown in the last congress. No deeper humiliation could be inflicted upon the real friends of human emancipation from the cruel superstition of religion than was inflicted upon them in the recent congress. There was a manifest disregard of all that has been done, and those that hav done it, and the way in which it was done. The services of all men and women who hav borne the burden and heat of the day were ignored entirely, while strangers to our cause, ignorant of the first principles of our cause, and ministers of the Lord Jesus Christ were invited to do the work of the congress. The natural, inevitable enemies of all that is fundamental even in the reformed constitution of the Union can never step on our rostrum without culpable mental reservation, forced to silence as to their true sentiment.

A platform which excludes God from any rights in the government of nations—can ministers stand on such a platform, and command the respect of the clergymen of the Christian church? It is impossible. They are unworthy of a place in the pulpits of Christendom. They must know that in the event of the success of Secularism the Sabbath and chaplaincies and God and the voice of the church will be left out. A prominent clergyman who had seen the invitation out inviting Christians to attend said to me: "I wonder if you think that we are fools. We cannot stand on your platform. We cannot coöperate with your aims without treason to Christianity or writing ourselvs down idiots. Aid to cast off our own rights—the idea is preposterous. No one but a Judas could do so." It is this Union policy that will drive a hundred away from the cause where it will draw one to it. Such a compromise as that of the last Congress will ruin the cause. And it will be needless to say, "You tied our hands." It is the tying of your own hands that we complain of. And then one thing more. It is this constant tinkering that is costing the cause dearly. At Cassadaga we had the promis of a "new deal." We had it—and it cost us three-fourths of our strength. It is tinker and doctor, and hence it has come to pass that at the last doctoring which the cause received at the last congress nothing, comparativly, but the doctors is left—which I believe is the usual case.

The doctor is real kind in giving us the real interpretation of the constitution, its purposes and aims; and with the assurance that "he [Mr. Burnham] will at once know whether he is for them or not, and I wish that Mr. Burnham might join with us in so thinking." This is quite fatherly. If not, we are told, Mr. Burnham may go out of the Union as an enemy of the cause, and we will grant him the liberty to organize a society under some such title "as the Clerical Ku-Klux-Klan, the Anti-Superstition Zouaves, the Secular Up-and-At-'Em Cohorts." This is really a very kind act, and very considerate of the doctor. But I am greatly gratified that in the event that I should be thus allowed to do, under the sanction of his holiness, I should not need to go far in search of a suitable leader. Judging by the popish tendencies which the doctor has shown in this article in review and the flippancy with which he writes fatherly encyclicals and issues bulls, he would make a pope for any of the new organizations which he suggests—as good, I presume, as the average pope.

"If you think as we do." That is the rub. That is what Liberals will not do. They are not at present in want of a pope. But doubtless this will become a necessity in the near future if we can repeat the last congress a few times. But the closing pontifical bull is worthy of a place in history. "Now we are off on another tack, which at least has the merit of being business-like, and the advantage of being piloted by officers who hav made a success of other affairs in this world"—with the implication that they will make a success in another world. This implication may account for the clerical dignity of the last congress. "And the leisure to giv a large share of their time and attention to engineering the work of the Union." It is fortunate that the Union now has such officers—with the implication that it never had such before. It looks to me that we hav had men equally competent with the modest men who now speak with authority. It was once said of O. S. Fowler that he said in a lecture, "There are but three great men in America—one is Daniel Webster, the other is Henry Clay, and modesty forbids me to name the third." There are but three great men now—the two divines who did the speaking for the last congress, and our great, eminent, worthy Dr. Foote, Jr.

J. H. BURNHAM.

Christ.

There is reason to believe that the conception of Christ will be the chief conception in the Christian religion during the time of that religion's further continuance. Especially, the conception of Christ as a great moral teacher, as an ideal of nobleness and gentleness. This has not always been so. At times the figure of Christ has been one of comparativ insignificance, while that of Jehovah has been the prominent one. And besides this, the Virgin and behind her an uncounted rabble of saints hav during certain periods diverted to themselvs a great part of the total amount of Christian devotion. But this is changing. Devotion to the Virgin and saints has been relegated to the background by the rise of Protestantism. And devotion to the bloody and abominable Jehovah fades, and must fade, as the refining influence of civilization advances. A little further along, we find civilization also repudiating or neglecting the supernatural element in the conception of Christ, leaving remaining as the central idea a conception of a sublime man, a moral teacher and ideal for our imitation.

Of course, this movement is in different stages of progress in different localities. In the more benighted Catholic countries minds require a form of religion suited to their low stage of development, a polytheism, and there the Virgin and saints high and low make Christianity virtually a polytheistic religion. Minds there hav been unable to receive abstract conceptions, but are rather on the plane that requires image-worship, and so eminence has been attained by those deities most suitable for representation by images, that is, Christ, the Virgin, and the saints. In Protestant countries minds hav got a little beyond idols and ceremonies, and hav made some approach to the conception of one universal substance pervading and maintaining all nature. That is, they are gradually being led up to the Spencerian conception of one universal Unknowable Energy. But in the main their minds hav been unable to throw off the tendency to personify. And during the continuance of these Protestants in the practice of representing to themselvs this Energy by some personal form, it is notable that they hav not chosen for that personal form the figure of Christ, as the Catholics did, but hav instead manifested a preference for that of Jehovah. The cause of this different choice seems to be as follows. It was naturally the more stern and combativ of the subjects of the papacy that first threw off its yoke; and as naturally were these stern and combativ persons attracted rather to the stern and combativ Jehovah than to the gentler Christ. The traditions of these generations hav been handed down among their descendants, influencing their character; and these descendants hav besides been continually compelled to maintain their independence of the papacy by the most desperate efforts and under the most overwhelming persecutions. Consequently their spirit assumed more and more a fierce and harsh cast; they found a parallel to their case in that of the persecuted rulers of Israel whom Jehovah fought for; they eagerly searched the Old Testament to develop the parallel in every little detail; and the result has been their according to the Old Testament nearly the whole of their attention and to Jehovah nearly the whole of their worship. But now civilization has risen, and wherever its refining sentiments hav obtained there is recoil from the revolting character of the Jewish God. He is dropped, and Christ brought forward. And, as we said, in those few spots where civilization has reached its highest pitch a still further advance is made. In such spots the highly cultivated mind is unable to bring itself to accept the supernatural at all, and the sole remaining object of devotion is Christ in his character of moral teacher.

So Freethinkers in arguing against Christianity will find that religion defended from varying standpoints. If they liv in a remote and benighted country district they will hav to do with harsh and ungentle elders who still think Genesis good science, are full of the unpronounceable names of ancient Jewish gentlemen, still talk of those detestable criminals called God's favorits as moral models, and call down vengeance on Rationalistic heads in the language of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Such men are little attracted by the character and precepts of Christ. The class of arguments assailing this character and these precepts will be little needed by Freethinkers combating this order of men. A little farther along in civilization, as in more educated and refined districts, and cities, we find less said about Old Testament achievements in science and Jehovah's formidableness as a fighting-man. Here we find Christ the central figure. Sometimes his supernatural aspect is regarded, and sometimes his human and moral. Go a step farther and his supernatural aspect is found to be regarded less and his human and moral aspect more. Each of these three classes requires a different set of arguments for its conversion. Arguments require to be directed, with the first, against scientific blunders and barbarous inhumanity; with the second, against miracles, the reliability of the gospels, and the like. With the third, a new order of arguments is called for.

It is to the exhibition of a few, among the order of arguments last-mentioned, that the remainder of this article will be devoted.

The class of men who wish to giv Christ the position, as ideal man and moral teacher, of which we hav spoken, is composed partly of advanced clergymen, and partly of timid or ill-judging Rationalists who hope thus to reconcile Christians to their rejection of the rest of the faith. To both we say that their position is illogical, absurd, and harmful.

The first point we make against the position is, that even if Christ's morality were perfect, it is so intimately bound up with supernaturalism that we can never promulgate it without at the same time forwarding the influence of that supernaturalism, and thus doing far more harm than good. Those who hav come to reject the supernaturalism must recognize, and might as well recognize now as later, that the natural and moral part that they wished to keep has been spoiled for all practical use by the circumstance of its having been associated with things hurtful and dangerous; and that if they want to teach morality they must go for their teachers to some of the much better instructors whose teachings hav been good and safe throughout.

The second point we make against the position is that, apart from the just-mentioned fault of being bound up with dangerous supernatural theories, Christ's character and conduct considered as forming an ideal, and his teachings as a moral founder, are, even in themselvs, not good, but are most strongly calculated to produce evil.

In the holding up of Christ's general conduct as an ideal for all to imitate, there is ascribed to him a heroic and superhuman patience and fortitude. Nothing could be more false. The very opposit is true. Countless persons hav borne tortures and death in uncomplaining silence. Christ bewailed his approaching crucifixion in agonies of fear, sweating "as it were great drops of blood." On the cross he weakly broke down and reproached his father, dying with upbraidings that the father had forsaken him. Nothing could be more irreconcilable with the language preachers bestow on him than his conduct as it actually is recorded. The two are precisely antithetical, and nothing could produce such an outrageous perversion of statement but a system where everything is confusion and extravagance—falsehood truth, and truth falsehood. And yet Christ is supposed to hav been a God, and supernaturally upheld.

Christ cursed a fig-tree so that it withered away, upon having his anger raised by its not bearing figs out of season. Is not this the conduct of a lunatic from bedlam? Is it the conduct of a sane man? Is it actually wished that we go about doing such things now? What would be thought of us if we should? Then what is meant when it is said that "we should try to lift ourselvs to the ennobling standard of that perfect life, whose beauty, now stripped of the perversions of a crude theology, comes down to us across the ages with" so and so, and so and so? Is anything meant, or nothing? Would not the very persons exhorting us to do such pueril and senseless things be the first to commit us to a madhouse if we went out on the highway and tried to do them tomorrow? Or do they mean that we should imitate not this, but certain others of his acts? But when we fix upon those certain others, and show that they are equally foolish or harmful, will they not refer us back to this again? Do they actually mean anything at all?

It is useless to say that Christ taught forgivness. He sometimes enjoined it, but as he continually broke into reviling and anger himself, and damned his enemies to everlasting torment, we can only say that the total of his influence must be generativ of revengefulness. It is to be remembered that in the Old Testament there is not an intimation that man's errors will be visited with an eternal punishment. In the Old Testament, inflictions are of this world only, and the weary, mistaken, tempted mortal at last sleeps the sleep of peace. It is in the New Testament, it is in the utterances of Jesus Christ, that we first come upon the announcement of eternal retribution. The plain truth is that Christ suggested that we forgiv our enemies, while he went on glutting his revenge on his own. This is more shameful than the course, at least consistent, of some rough man who if severe on his antagonists at least is satisfied that others should be the same toward theirs. It is the course of any scoundrel who wants others to be very meek and giv him all the more room to go on slaughtering himself. In this, as in many other things, the Christian religion has got everything precisely the reverse of what it really is. The most prodigious example of unforgiving, insatiable, fiend-like revengefulness the world has ever seen, is exhibited as an example of the opposit character of forgivness.

Equally unfounded is the representation that Christ proposed to confer peace upon mankind. He expressly states that he came to bring "not peace, but a sword." Elsewhere he directs that "he that hath no sword, let him sell his garments and buy one."

Christ's inculcation of non-resistance to evil, and of obedience to the established powers, has done incomputable harm. This doctrin has ever been the favorit one of tyrants. Where the scriptures came from, no one knows; but it will not be rash to conjecture that this doctrin, at least, was written to order for some despot. The only cases in which we should submit to injuries are those in which we may expect thereby to touch the feelings of the injurers —in which more good than ill will result. And we should not hav been counseled to obey the powers of government whether they are right or wrong. They should be obeyed only when they are right, not when they are wrong.

The best way to determin the fitness of a moral code for human guidance is to observe its practical effects as it actually has operated. Such observation of the effects of Christ's moral code, when it was universally adopted and acted on in the Dark Ages, shows that it is probably the worst that has ever misled and debased mankind. All that is original with Jesus—the backbone of his system of religion—is harsh and infamous. His gentle precepts, the Golden Rule, the patient words and noble acts ascribed to him, are copied from the words and acts of other "saviors," and credit for his "pure morality," his "perfect life," and all the noble qualities with which he has been endowed by idealists and sentimentalists should be transferred to them.

Evolution and Revolution in the Church.

All of my paternal, maternal, and fraternal relativs, as far back as the illustrious Jonathan Edwards, who was the great-grandfather of my mother, were loyal to the church and to the Presbyterian creed, so far as it was practicable for them to assent and believe. Yet I do not remember of one who did not entertain grave doubts concerning many articles of the creed. They tried, and I tried, sincerely and earnestly not only to assent to the creed when we united with the church, but to believe every article of faith. But we never could believe the dogmas. I hav been stoker and porter, usher and bell-ringer, trustee, clerk and deacon, precentor and sermon reader, Bible-class expounder and superintendent of Sabbath-schools, all at one and the same time for many years. And I hav been connected, during my residence in different states, with eight different Presbyterian or Congregational churches, and my name, ten years ago, showed on a church record that my standing was valid and regular. Whether my name has been erased from that record I do not know, neither do I care, even enough to make inquiry. I think that I am pretty familiar with the "ins and outs" of the Presbyterian church. I learned long ago that the essential difference between the Congregational and the Presbyterian church is this: Whenever a member was to be disciplined for heresy or any offense, the session, deacons, elders, and minister adjudged the accused to be innocent or guilty; and if found guilty they took a rope and hanged the unfortunate victim.

But, in the Congregational church (in which the entire church had a voice), they let a convicted person take a rope and hang himself. That constitutes the essential difference between the two churches.

Well, the Presbyterian church, having but few Bibles, evolved a little book called, "The Presbyterian Confession of Faith," made up of portions of the Bible, accompanied with brief paragraphs explanatory of the creed of the church, according to the Bible. After the church had evolved a standard for their belief, in the form of the Confession of Faith, many of the clergy and elders in the church began to interpret the Bible by the Confession of Faith. By and by a revision of the Bible seemed to be eminently important. So, a revision was evolved, which was the most disastrous blow to the divine inspiration of the Bible, that was ever given to that book. Now, the great majority of the clergy and laity, also, hav lost faith in the divine authenticity of the holy scripture, so that many want the revision revised; and some want a revised creed, or confession of faith, while others want to allow the Confession of Faith to remain unchanged; and they demand that a new creed (a new Confession of Faith) be prepared, in which all the dogmas and odious and unbelievable doctrins shall be omitted. Many clergymen and many more laymen desire to take the Bible, only, as the creed of the church. The clergy hav evolved so far in practice and precepts, that they no longer preach but very few of the fundamental doctrins laid down in the Confession of Faith. Rev. Theo. L. Cuyler, one of the leading clergy of Brooklyn, L. I., wrote, recently, in the New York Evangelist, that "he would as soon cut off his right hand, as to preach the doctrin of election to unbelievers." The church hav evolved different tenets until they hav nearly revolved to the condition of the world when there was no Bible. Very few of the clergy and nearly all intelligent laymen hav lost faith in the divine authenticity of the holy scripture. Evolution has wrought a revolution. ESS E. TEE.

Freethought in Sweden.

Our Swedish brethren certainly deserve success in their battle against superstition. The resolution and activity displayed by them is surprising to an American accustomed to the indifference shown by the greater number of Freethinkers in this country.

From his prison on Longholman, Victor Lennstrand speaks the words of cheer and advice to his followers and, best of all, his advices are followed. His vigorous and thoughtful writings, his own and his followers' open defiance of orthodox prohibition, issued by a hypocritic government; the brotherly feeling and restless activity of the Freethinkers at large, hav aroused both press and people as well as the clergy. The Swedish press is divided into two hostil camps, one containing Oogens Nyheter, Aftonbladet, Fädernestandet, Socialdemohraten. Arbetedez takes the Liberal side and has succeeded in making Utiliskarne the subject of general conversation. The protest issued November 3d by Utiliska Samfundet against the imprisonment of V. Lennstrand is yet the question of the day. The crown and clergy are kicking, but the bag of progress tied to these mules will soon make them tired of such exercise. The anger of the clergy is so great that it has forgotten to be "wise as serpents;" it has thrown the mask aside. In Elfsborg the principal clergyman declares that public libraries exert a destructiv influence, and from the pulpit in the Trondhjem cathedral Bishop Laache expresses the wish "that there never had existed a printing-press."

The local society in Stockholm has a Sunday-school, which is attended by over sixty children, while the ladies of the same society hav formed a sewing society and are at present very busy with preparations for a Utiliska Christmas bazar. The society at large holds its business meetings every Wednesday, while Sunday evenings are given over to lectures and discussions, which now and then are followed by a soiree and dance; yet our friends do not stop here. Almost every Swede is a born vocalist, hence a Utiliska singing society is under organization, and soon will the mind-elevating tones from a large choir sound through the new rooms in Tunnelgarten informing the merry Stockholmers that the Swedish Freethinkers are not alone alive but also cheerful, in spite of their having no thoughts of hell to console themselvs with. A prosperous New Year to our Swedish brethren. G. N.

An Odorous Nugget With a Moral.

A farmer's wife had cooped a brood of young chickens in the woodshed, and at night the mother-hen gave warning that an enemy had invaded her household. The wife informed the husband, who took a light and proceeded to investigate the cause of the trouble. He found that one of those little four-footed animals, so well known among farmers by its noiseless squat and peculiar smell, was making a supper of one of the chickens. He took a long pole which the boys had used to thrash nuts from the trees, and began to pommel the intruder. The wife began to plead for mercy.

"There, there, don't pound the life entirely out of the poor brute."

But he made the blows fall quick and hard until, it is safe to say, it was the last chicken-supper that the peddler of "sweet scents" ever got. The next day there was a peculiar odor about the house better imagined than described. The sense of smell was a little too acute to hav the air in and about the house agreeable. The wife, with thumb and finger clasped upon her nose, said, "Something must be done; there is no living in this house."

"Wife," replied the husband, "I thought there would be as much of the 'varmint' left as you would desire, even if I did pound the life out of it."

MORAL.

If the farmer and his wife had begun to fight about the best method of protecting the brood, the skunk would hav got away with the rest of the chickens. Every blow which has a tendency to weaken the church and the influence of the clergy upon the minds of the people is needed—let it come down with a strong arm. Instead of disputing among ourselvs as to proper methods, let every man use his own weapon in his own way, but keep the blows falling. If a concert of action can be effected, all the better. With the heaviest blows we can strike, singly or combined, either by ridicule or reason, there will be enough of the "varmint" left for the good of the people.

Weak-kneed Liberals, remember, the harder the blows the sooner you kill. JOHN PECK.

Rather Severe upon George Chainey.

From the London Freethinker.

The attitude of the press toward Secularism is a noteworthy sign of the humbug of "free and impartial journalism." The leaders of Freethought in England may lecture to thousands of people, and organize societies, and hold important conferences, but the press is practically mum. Mr. Bradlaugh is treated as an eminent politician, but as a Secular leader he is simply regarded as non-existent. Yet if Mrs. Besant turns Theosophist, the papers that were silent about her Atheism will giv her paragraphs and articles; and if a half-demented person like George Chainey visits England as a convert from Freethought to moonshine, a paper like the Pall Mall Gazette will giv him half a column of small type, as though his eccentric wanderings made him an important personage.

According to the P. M. G., "Professor Chainey [what is he professor of?] at one time was one of the leading Secularist lecturers in the United States, and has spent the most activ years of his life in combating all revealed religion and demonstrating the absurdity of the religious creeds accepted by mankind." The P. M. G. adds that his "lecturing at South Place Institute upon 'Revelation Revealed' is the transatlantic sequel of the remarkable development through which Mrs. Besant has passed in this country."

We do not envy Mrs. Besant's feelings on reading this sentence. It must be galling to find herself classed with a man regarded as a crank by the American Freethinkers who still remember him. The P. M. G. does not appear to know that George Chainey's "version"—the reader can add con and per at discretion—is so far from being the "sequel" of Mrs. Besant's that it preceded hers by several years. He was only a short time a Secularist lecturer. The work was hard and the remuneration slender, and he was naturally flighty, so he fell into Spiritualism, and went off to Australia, where he did not achieve a great success. Some incidents of his migration we prefer to pass over in silence. Our opinion is that George Chainey is hardly a responsible being. The P. M. G. gravely reports that "the interior of his head becomes red-hot," and in this condition he "sees visions." Very likely. They are many such cases in Colney Hatch.

Some time ago George Chainey was seeking enough money to take him to Palestine, where he was to be the recipient of a new revelation. It is a pity the philanthropic editor of the P. M. G. does not write a check for the amount, and pack this "remarkable man" off to Jerusalem or Jericho.

Searching for More Spirits.

A short time ago the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER said:

We noticed by a letter from Lyman C. Howe in the Spiritual Instructor, that Medium Reid obtains messages on slates from the other world, as well as answers to letters. And if Mr. Howe is to be believed, Mr. Reid is a phenomenal slate-writer, for he says that all Mr. Reid's demonstrations given in public are under "absolute fraud-proof conditions," and that to private sitters he says, "Bring your own slates, privately marked and fastened as you like, screwed, nailed, riveted, or tied as snugly as you please, and keep them in your own hands, and under these conditions the slates are filled with messages." If Mr. Reid can do all that Mr. Howe claims for him, the next time he comes east we should like to hav him giv Mr. McArthur and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER a sitting.

Mr. Reid in the last number of the Spiritual Instructor replies:

We take you at your word, Bro. Macdonald, and will see that Mr. McArthur and yourself will hav an opportunity of investigating slate-writing at the earliest opportunity. Of one thing I am convinced, and that is, if the phenomena are produced in your presence, you are gentlemen enough to acknowledge the fact, and that is more than some persons who claim to be Spiritualists hav backbone enough to do.

THE Herald at Bertrand, Neb., says: "In Indiana a section hand repaired a broken rail and averted a disaster. The work was done on Sunday and the section hand was fined for desecrating the Sabbath. It seems hardly possible that in this land of freedom and this age of enlightenment there are persons narrow-minded enough to bring about a thing of this kind, but there are. The same inquisitorial spirit that burnt heretics and witches at the stake in the dark ages of bigotry and superstition is still alive to some extent."

FRANCIS V. KING, a member of New York's legislature, has announced his intention of finding out how much state money given to religious schools is used to support churches. He says: "I expect to introduce a resolution calling on the several institutions in this state which are in receipt of public moneys and which hav charge of juvenil delinquents or other children, to report to the assembly the disposition of the children after being received into such institutions, the character of the instruction followed, expenses of the institution, the amounts received from the state treasury and many other details. I am told that many institutions receive assistance from the state and appropriate that portion of the state funds which they do not use to the support of their churches. I am also informed that from the manner in which the annual reports are drawn up it is impossible in all instances to trace the application of the state money appropriated for such purposes."

Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History—Is It a Modern Forgery?

Eusebius quotes from the "Apology" of Tertullian an account of the persecution of Christians in Bithynia, which Tertullian himself quotes from the correspondence between Pliny the Younger and the emperor Trajan. There are nine books of the letters of Pliny, all copied and selected by himself, with none of the replies thereto, and a tenth book containing the letters of Pliny and Trajan. If Pliny wrote the letters in the first nine books he was a literary coxcomb; if he wrote the letters to Trajan he was a sophomoric saphead.

In regard to the latter series the translator Melmoth says:

> They are of a style and character extremely different from those in the preceding collection; whence some critics hav injudiciously inferred that they are the production of another hand.

Five years ago we dissected these letters and adduced cogent reasons for rejecting them as forgeries. We then supposed that they were fabricated about the end of the second century. This belief was based on the quotations from them by Tertullian, who is supposed to hav written his "Apology" before A D. 220. But now we hav little doubt that that "Apology" was written as late as the fifteenth century, in which case the letters of Pliny and Trajan are also modern fabrications.

The Latin Dictionary we used at school was Ainsworth's. It has not the word Christus nor Christianus in the Latin part; but in the part which givs the Latin equivalents of English words we find this:

> A Christian, *|| Christianus.
> Christianism or Christianity, *|| Christianismus.
> Christmas, *|| Christi natalium festum.

What do these asterisks mean? Let Ainsworth answer:

> *Before a word shows it to be of Greek extraction.
> ||Before a word denotes that it is bad, or used only by writers of an inferior class.

Now the words Christus and Christianos are used by Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny the Younger, Tertullian, and all the succeeding Latin fathers. But the "Annals of Tacitus," in which Christus occurs, was forged by Poggio Bracciolini in the fifteenth century, who was also the finder of the works of Tertullian.

Unctus is the Latin for Christos, and would hav been so translated by a Latin scholar of the second century or of any later time. We read about Philip the Fair, Charles the Bald, and other French kings with epithets suffixed to their names; but how absurd it would be to write their names in English, Philip the Bel and Charles the Chauve!

Is not the use of the words Christus and Christianus sufficient evidence of the modern fabrication of all the ancient writings, Christian and pagan, in which those words occur? And since Eusebius quotes with approval those spurious Latin works, does it not necessarily follow that his "Ecclesiastical History" is also a modern forgery?

The system of forgery, says Father Hardouin, was meditated and begun in the reign of Philip Augustus (1180–1223); was more fully developed under Philip the Fair (1285–1314), and Valesius (1328–1350); and continued through a period of one hundred and fifty years. The gang of forgers had alphabets of all ages and in every language, especially Greek and Latin; also inks and parchments of all ages, and in some instances the fraud is made apparent by the striking similarity of the letters to those of old New Testament codices, showing a plain imitation, as if done by the same hand. It was necessary for these impious forgers to produce very many books so as to make it appear that unwritten tradition is opposed to the ancient records. And by a multitude of volumes they hoped to render the fraud less easy of detection. As many works in Latin, so many in Greek were necessary, lest it should be suspected that it was all done in the Latin quarter. And they made a distribution like this: To Greece they gave Gregory Nazianzen and Chrysostom; to Cappadocia, Basilius and Gregory Nyssenus; to the East, Theodosius and Eusebius; to Egypt, Clement, Origen, Athanasius, and Cyril; to Italy, Ambrose, Leo, and Gregory; to Palestine and Syria, Justin and Cyril of Damascus; to Cyprus, Epiphanius; to Africa, Tertullian, Cyprian, Optatus, Augustine, and Fulgentius; and to other parts many more.

It was necessary to hav so many volumes of history, so many of councils, and so many of other kinds; to fabricate so many decretals, canons, definitions, forms of prayer, histories, controversies, etc. These writings were continued through all the ages, lest the fraud of one age should be suspected. So the work was divided into ages, with the parts assigned to each, and thus the pretended doctrin and disciplin grew up by degrees.

The lying rascals did not cease their work, but kept on fabricating false monuments of the former times. They meant to cover the world with their forgeries, so that nothing should be read, if possible, except what they furnished.

They forged apocryphal books; for example the "Clementines" (containing the story of Clement of Rome), the "Preaching of Peter," and the "Pastor of Hermas."

Sometimes there were more than one fabricator of the same work, the last one taking it up after the death of the former and imitating his style and argument. Thus there were two, three, or more writers of the same work in one age.

The amount of work done was not, however, so very great. The writings of all the Greek and Latin fathers do not exceed in quantity what Luther and Calvin and their associates produced in fifty years. The works of Augustine do not exced those of Alphonso Tostado or Albert le Grande. There were in the sixteenth century many learned men in Italy, and if those had united in a common purpose, how many works they could hav produced in Greek and Latin, in prose and poetry, far superior to those of Augustine and Ambrose, or any of the rest; for in recent times we hav had writers who could vie with Cicero and Virgil.

Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius of Cæsarea (author of "Ecclesiastical History"), Theodoretus of Syria, and Justin of Rome, all had the same library, for they praise the same authors and repeat the same fables. So also with the rest.

Their style of writing is similar, indicating one age. At first they wrote apologies, epistles, treatises against heretics, and homilies; afterward commentaries and studies of the earlier fathers, and lastly, theological summaries and commentaries on summaries. The author's name was sometimes wanting, being purposely suppressed, so that in a later age the work could be ascribed to some great name.

Not only did they write on parchment, but on leaden plates And we hav had recent imitators of this. About the year 1599 a manuscript in Arabic was cited as found in a cave near Granada, and attested by D. Petro De Castro, archbishop of that city. It contained many fables concerning the infant savior (the "Arabic Gospel of the Infancy"). These leaden plates were, after many years, examined at Rome, in the pontificate of Alexander VII. (1655–7) and condemned as apocryphal. There are many of this kind of leaden sheets said to hav been deposited in the tombs of the saints, with the names either of princes or consuls inscribed upon them. False inscriptions are also found on tombstones.

As in our own time the Jansenists, who are heirs of the former impiety, write elegantly in the Gallic vernacular, so in the fourteenth century those who wrote the best Latin gave us Cicero, Virgil's Æneid Lactantius (the "Christian Cicero"), and other authors most noted for elegant writing. But they took care to hav their own lucubrations appear under those great names, because by concealing themselvs they had no fear of the powers that be, and, by giving pretended authority, they could fortify their Atheism in all time past. In the use of the names of Virgil, Cicero, Plutarch, and others they were more desirous of propagating their impiety than of acquiring fame.

Such is the argument of one of the most learned Jesuits that ever lived. For publishing some of these opinions he was condemned and debarred from promotion in the church. But he lived nineteen years longer, and just before his death, in 1729, he wrote a little volume reiterating his former views. This was published in London in 1766, but being in Latin it has remained practically a sealed book until I translated portions of it for THE TRUTH SEEKER in 1858.

With a mythical messiah for a corner-stone and a fabricated history for a superstructure, how long can the Christian edifice withstand the assaults of critical science?

ANTICHRIST.

My Opinion.

During historic times hundreds of gods hav been worshiped, and hundreds of men hav had divine honors paid to them. Many animals, and even reptils, hav been made the objects of adoration.

These gods hav been real or imaginary. If imaginary, the chances are a hundred to one that all are imaginary, including the father, son, and the other fellow. If these gods hav all been real, there can be no safety unless we worship them all.

In the name of these gods thousands of human beings hav been sacrificed. In the name of these gods thousands of human beings hav been enslaved, plundered, and tortured. In the name of these gods the highway of progress has been hedged up, institutions of learning hav been suppressed, the most cruel wars hav been waged, and the most inhuman tortures inflicted. Mental development and human equality hav never been pleasing to the gods. They hav always been partial to priestcraft and kingcraft, and to their own peculiar people, and enemies to all the rest.

Can it be shown that the gods of the ancients were of any benefit to the people? Is it not about time to let them go; they never hav, and never can, do any good. As far as history informs us there never was a time when the gods proved a benefit to the people. On the contrary, the earth has been saturated with human gore, because those engaged in wars hav believed that they were carrying out the will of some imaginary god or gods. Wars hav been waged by one nation, and millions slain, because they believed that another nation were enemies to God and that he was pleased with the slaughter. Hundreds hav been killed for saying something which offended a believer in some fancied tenant of the skies. As long as men spend half their time in thinking about the gods, and turn over half they produce to forward some object in the interest of the gods, we shall grope on in ignorance and poverty.

The gods will undoubtedly die hard, but die they will sooner or later, and good and wise men will rejoice when they lose their imaginary power. When the gods are forgotten the top-root of superstition will wither. The thoughts of men will then be turned to the welfare of each other, and then we shall begin to understand, as never before, the capabilities of the human mind, and the hights to which man can ascend. The gods can do without us as soon as we outgrow our ignorance so as to know that we can do without them.

In ancient times, when gods were as plenty as blackberries, I hav no doubt that the people imagined that the gods were doing something for their benefit, and that blessings were showered down upon them which were regarded as coming directly from the gods.

I saw a woman who had been confined to her bed for fourteen years. Every few minutes during my stay I heard the ejaculation, "How good God is to me!" Could a greater absurdity be imagined? And yet I hav no doubt of the woman's honesty. All must admit that her helplessness for fourteen years was a queer manifestation of God's goodness.

Some of the most devout people hav been the most unfortunate, and hav suffered the most. Some tyrannical wretches and public plunderers hav fared the best.

The above considerations should satisfy every intelligent mind that there is no overruling providence—that there is no intelligence directing the affairs of this world above the human—that the cases where people think there is divine interposition are in every instance imaginary.

Every day brings news of some church edifice being burnt or blown down or struck with lightning. Occasionally we hear of a disaster at sea, and a part of the people on board the vessel are saved and a part lost. But no one can form a just estimate of the ones lost or saved by their being good or bad. God strikes down a good man as readily as a bad one. He whacks away at a church with as much gusto as he does at a gambling-house.

We hav some unmitigated rogues and rapscallions who seem to be highly favored and liv to an extreme old age. When, if a missionary or some noted evangelist is favored in the same way, his good fortune is attributed to an overruling providence. How long will it take for the pious pachyderms to learn that God does not carry on any business in this world?

The mud brought up all along the line of the Atlantic telegraph cable was found to be composed almost entirely of the remains of microscopic animals. Chalk is mainly made up of minute shells. In making a single figure upon a blackboard, thousands of these little shells are crushed. Millions and trillions of these animals must hav been brought into existence, and other millions died, in a second of time. They were doubtless capable of enjoyment and suffering, and died of age or pain and disease like other animals. Where there is life there must be pain and pleasure according to the organization of the animal.

A portion of the animals are defenseless and are the prey and the natural food of other animals. Man slays millions of animals every year because their existence is detrimental to his happiness. He slays other millions for food.

Portions of different countries hav been devastated by fire and flood, epidemics and famin, earthquakes, volcanoes, and tornadoes. Thousands through superstition hav been sacrificed to the gods. The numbers which hav been slain in foolish and cruel wars cannot be enumerated. Millions hav been imprisoned and tortured and put to death to gratify the whims of some fanatic or tyrant. Without exception all life is subject to disease and death. At the best throughout the animal and vegetable kingdom there is a constant struggle for existence.

Where is the loving-kindness of the supreme manager which the Christian talks so much about? Do the foregoing facts show forth his mercy which "endureth forever?" If he is possessed of all power and all knowledge and "his mercy endureth forever," every phase of existence should afford pleasurable emotions.

These facts come home to every intelligent mind and show that the laws of nature are the only supreme ruler—that they are blind to consequences—unmoved by entreaty and as heartless as a stone. There is no God to hav anything to do with the affairs of earth—all is subject to inflexible law.

In ancient times when these laws were less understood, the people had a multiplicity of gods. The gods hav decreased in numbers as these laws hav been studied and interpreted. When they are fully understood the gods will vanish.

Did God superintend the creation of each animal in a piece of chalk which occupied a shell so small that the highest magnifying power is required to enlarge it sufficiently for the human eye to take cognizance of it? Then think of mountains of chalk composed of these minute shells. Did God speak into existence separately each one of the microscopic animals which compose the mud of thousands of square miles of the ocean's bed? And did he appoint a time for each to die? If he did he has been a busy God, and I wouldn't be surprised to hear any day that he has struck in favor of the eight-hour system.

For what purpose did God create all of those great uncouth animals in the early ages of the world? These great scaly, slimy monsters were unlike any animals known since man's advent on the earth. They certainly could not hav been created for man's benefit.

The Christian will tell you that God created them for his own glory. Well, I would say it was a great waste of raw material to little purpose. It must hav afforded him infinit delight to see some of these monsters splash in and dart through the water and others drag their slimy lengths through the mud. Perhaps it was a diversion to him while he was taking his nooning.

Why did God create the centipede, tarantula, rattlesnake, and millions of flies and poisonous insects to bite and sting and torment and kill us? Why bring a tiger into existence to tear and worry other animals as well as human beings?

Is it not strange that a God of mercy, who has a tender regard for his children more than an earthly parent can hav, should cause an earthquake to turn a great city like Lisbon topsy-turvy and sacrifice hundreds of human lives, the innocent with the guilty? Where is his "loving-kindness," where the "infinit mercy," where the "watchful eye of the good shepherd?"

Did you ever stand in the forest and see the leaves fall in autumn? One comes down with a spiral motion, like the motion of the screw to a propeller as it spins in the water; another pursues a zigzag course in its descent; another glides first to the right, then to the left, like a thin piece of iron sinking in the water; another sails away in the breeze without turn or flutter, like a piece of clapboard gliding down the current. Though they fall as fast as snowflakes, no two fall just alike.

Now let us watch that one coming down with a spiral motion that we may get it and examin it. We find that it has a long, heavy stem which kept the head of the leaf down. The blade is twisted somewhat like an auger, and that is the cause of the spiral motion. There is a reason why every leaf falls just as it does.

If you throw up a handful of feathers in the wind, they will not all perform the same evolutions. One may light near by, another is carried far away; scarcely two will describe the same curves or light in the same place.

Does God direct the falling of every leaf? Does he direct the course of every feather in the wind, of every piece of driftwood that is carried hither and thither by wind and current? Some day we shall learn that in air, earth, and ocean there is a cause for everything being what it is, and as it is. As fast as we understand the natural the supernatural will dis appear. In past centuries good or evil spirits were supposed to be behind every phenomenon. As we hav been lifted out of the quagmire of superstition the spirits hav been retired from activ service.

Few at the present day believe that smallpox, yellow fever, or cholera is the work of evil spirits. In time of battle we no longer sacrifice human beings in order to enlist the spirits and induce them to turn the tide of battle in our favor.

And so as we study the laws of nature and come to understand them more fully and perfectly, we shall see a reason for everything, miracles will cease, and the gods will disappear forever. JOHN PECK.

The Ownership of Land.

Several weeks ago one of the subscribers, a Mr. McMullen, of Dodgeville, Wis., asked, "What man in America owns the most land, and how much does he own?" I hav examined every paper which has appeared since that time for an answer to the above question, but without seeing any. My own opinion is that the man who owns the largest quantity of land will be very desirous of keeping quiet about it; but it is very important that every man and woman in the country should use every effort to find out what is being done with the land which belongs to all. Some time ago I read an article in the American Grange Bulletin, of Cincinnati, in the course of which occurred a quotation from an account given by Mr. W. Goodwin Moody, who, in 1883, made a tour of investigation through the Northwest, West, and Southwest, to ascertain the facts as they then existed, and afterward published the result of his investigations in a book entitled, "Land and Labor in the United States."

It cannot be said that a precise answer is given by Mr. Moody to exactly the question put by your correspondent, as the largest farms mentioned are owned by corporations rather than by individuals; but the facts given are all in the line of thought indicated by him.

I quote from the Bulletin: "Space will allow us to giv only a very brief synopsis of Mr. Moody's account of the farms he saw and the system on which they were operated, and the profit that was made by operating them on a large scale, which, in the wheat-growing districts at that time, paid, in some instances, between forty and fifty per cent on the investment, after allowing twenty-five per cent for wear and tear of teams, implements, and harness, and ten per cent on capital.

"Mr. Moody tells us that, in the wheat and small grain growing districts of Minnesota and Dakota, farms were common which were operated by superintendent and foreman the same as factories and mills of corporations. Since the time he was on the ground many of these farms hav been merged into syndicates. We will giv a few of them as an illustration. He tells us of the Cass farm, 6,355 acres; the Cheney farm, 5,200; the Grandin farm, 40,000; the Grandin brothers' farm, 30,000; the Thompson and Shuman, 1,300; Thompson and Kendall farm, 4,400; the Rock Co. Farming Co.'s farm, 21,000. In some of these farms he found as much as 6,000 acres in wheat and small grain. Further on in the grazing country of Kansas and Colorado, he found the Allen and Butler farm of 27,000 acres, and Captain King's farm of 150,000 acres under fence, and 200,000 acres unfenced. We could go on and giv a column of similar farms. But what we hav cited shows conclusivly that Mr. Derbyshire is in error when he says that the syndicates do not want the land.

"The facts are, corporations and companies are gobbling up the land as fast as they can, and will attack the older settled states as soon as they can bear down the price of land; they will then be able to buy it at their own figures, at sheriff sales and foreclosures, as we will show further on.

"It is not only our home syndicates and speculators who are after the land, but another dangerous element—the foreign or alien landowner. In order to show what they are doing in the way of getting possession of our land, we will append a partial list of the foreign landowners:

I hope that the information given in the article quoted from the Bulletin will prove satisfactory to your correspondent. It certainly mentions some very large farms; if there are any larger ones, I hav never heard of them. RUTH BRETTELL.

The New Book of Morals.

Since it is a settled fact that we are to hav a book which will teach morals without basing its instruction upon the Bible, I feel greatly encouraged. This is of prime importance, for it is everywhere asked, On what would you rely to teach youths morals, if not on the Bible? It does not seem to hav entered into the understanding of men that the first lesson in morals must come from the examples of parents, and such comments upon conduct in early childhood as will impress children with the difference between right and wrong—the praise of right actions and condemnation of wrong—nor that the duty of parents is never done until virtuous character is established in their children. Nor does it seem to hav entered the thoughts of many very respectable people that a virtuous, proud, high-minded character is our highest end and aim. People mistake reputation for character. Reputation is what others say of us; character is what we really are. Reputation may be attained by shrewd hypocrisy. Character has a more enduring basis, and scorns pretense and shams. Character is of slow growth and is enduring. Reputation, fame, leadership, may be "obtained without merit, and lost without a crime."

The sermon and the Sunday-school teach next to nothing of the building up of character nor its value. These are occupied with "saving" people from something not clearly defined. The teachings of the street are that success is always right. The teachings of commerce are, mainly, "Don't get found out unless you beat the other fellow." The bar teaches that lawyers may honorably lie and bribe and bully witnesses—if hired and paid for so doing—and that scoundrelly acts, if done for a client, are highly proper and professionally commendable. And statesmen (Lord, what a misnomer!) and politicians may lie, slander, bribe, and steal ballots for party success, and yet remain "honorable gentlemen," and be cheered when they appear in public.

The press—the newspaper—is as indifferent and as quiet on all occasions as if injustice, fraud, rascality, and lying were unknown vices. Crime is not crime till the offender has not only been found out, but "has been proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." The religious press forgets to teach morals, and spends its efforts on theology and the spread of sectarian teaching among the heathen.

Teachers in our common schools as well as parents turn children and youths over to the church and Sunday-schools for instruction in morals. Everyone shirks. Good manners can hardly be taught without including morals to a considerable extent, yet teachers in their institutes contend that they ought not to be required to teach either morals or manners.

Colleges as well as schools fail to giv moral instruction. Their curriculums now rarely mention moral philosophy or ethics. This was not so once. For this reason colleges influence character much less than they did fifty years ago.

The book in question will be a new departure, and ought to be welcomed.

About in 1840, when the Bible was quoted for and against slavery, one E. R. Tyler wrote a pamphlet of perhaps forty pages entitled, "Slavery a Malum in Se" (a wrong in itself). It was a most able and ample showing that there was no side nor nock nor corner of slavery that was not wrong. It was clear in its statements and iron-linked in its logic, but was in all respect fair toward the slaveholder, yet it left him no ground to stand on. But it expressly discarded all attempts to sustain its purpose by reference to the Bible. That book was not mentioned except in the preface. It relied solely on reason and justice to defend the right of every human being to liberty and equality before the law, and upon the same weapons to attack slavery. It was a valuable contribution to antislavery literature, and appealed to a class of minds that the Bible could not reach.

Now, it strikes me that a book of moral instruction can be written which shall be plain, simple, and interesting to children and youths and young men and women which shall teach the elements of morality, and not appeal in any way to the Bible for statement or authority. The best literature may be pressed into service to furnish illustrations and instruction. Stories and anecdotes may be related which will serve to impress its teachings on the mind. Fables will always be attractiv and useful. Those who had the good fortune to read in that dry and stilted old book, the English Reader, compiled by Lindley Murray, rarely ever forgot the invaluable teachings it contained. The Quakers held on to it till thirty years ago as a text-book of moral instruction in schools. And I know of several copies choicely kept and highly prized by gray-headed old men. It was an eminently unsectarian religious book, but its teachings were pure and noble. More than one young man owed his best aspirations to its teaching. It is full of materials for the proposed new work, and is all new to the present generation.

But the book must contain clear definitions, and use accurate language. It should not apply the opprobrious epithet "Infidel" to a doubter, but to men who are knowingly unfaithful to an understood duty; nor should it apply that term of reproach "Atheist" to any who merely do not believe in God, but to those only who deny his existence. Liberals are very unwise in using these terms as they do. These words are used by the pulpit to slander and deny all who oppose them. They are used to slander Thomas Paine, who did "believe in one God only," and to belie Colonel Ingersoll, who is simply not yet convinced there is a God or a future existence—who is, in short, an Agnostic. Faith in the Bible Dying Out.

The Christians are placed in a bad position by two legal happenings here and hereabouts recently. The first is the refusal of a Christian jury to believe human testimony as to supernatural events—as in the case of Mrs. Wells, the Spiritualist medium, on which we commented at the time to the very great satisfaction of our Spiritualist friends at Adelphi Hall. But the jury with that obtuseness which runs parallel with jury trials, the twelve good men and true who refused to credit or even to consider a dozen times more evidence than can be brought to support the occurrences related in the New Testament, did not see how hard a blow they struck at revelation. With the present knowledge of the world, the Christian religion could not be established in the nineteenth century.

Another legal blow at Christianity is the imprisonment of Edward Larssen, of Brooklyn, the faith-curist who refused to administer the medicin prescribed for his dying daughter. When the physician asked him why he did not giv the medicin to the child, who was suffering from diphtheria, he replied:

"It's God's child, and he will take care of it. If he wants it, he will take it."

To the judge who also asked him his reason for his neglect he gave substantially the same reason. Thereupon, in sentencing him to a year's imprisonment, Judge Tighe said:

"It is a singular thing that in this nineteenth century there are men with such a foolish belief as you and your society hav."

We do not know whether or not Judge Tighe is a Christian, but he has certainly added the weight of his official influence to a renunciation of the scriptures. The nineteenth century will hav none of the sacred revelations of the first or second centuries! Yet there is no plainer command in the whole Bible than that which enjoins a reliance upon religion in sickness. The Epistle of James, fifth chapter, 14th and 15th verses, reads:

"Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he hav committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."

By his sentencing Larssen, Judge Tighe has pronounced faith in God's word to be criminal. Whatever may be his professions, it is evident that he has no belief at all that divine commands were ever meant to be obeyed, or to be regarded as other than the "foolish belief" of certain writers. Christianity is being stabbed deeply in the house of its friends. As our poetical relativ on the Pacific coast sings:

"There is no Christian faith:
A man may say all increase is of God,
But he who plants not seed beneath the clod
Reaps barren sod.

"That man who hastes, when clouds are in the sky,
To house his grain, knows that no God on high
Will keep it dry.

"The mariner seeks heaven's aid no more,
But life preservers, when the breakers roar
On leeward shore.

"'The wind is tempered,' says the Christian seer,
Yet prudent herdsmen scarce are known to shear
At fall of year.

"We go to rest with prayer when day is o'er,
But seldom lock our sense in sleep before
We've locked the door.

"Believers rear their temples high and broad,
And then attach, not having trust in God,
A lightning rod.

"And who has read of flaming holocaust,
Nor noted, touching churches that were lost,
'Insured for cost.'

"Whoever for another day prepares,
And guards 'gainst danger coming unawares,
God's word forswears.

"He rises from his knees when prayers are said,
And, shunning heaven to whom he prayed,
Seeks human aid.

"There is no Christian faith;
Men with their lips may trust a God on high,
And by their every act their word deny,
I know not why."

But we can tell George why, and he should make a note of it. The reason why men hav no faith is because they know too much. They know that to reap they must sow; that plowing is surer to bring reward than praying, and that planting is the only prophecy likely to be fulfilled. The jury who refused to believe Mrs. Wells's witnesses knew that supernatural events are beyond human experience, and Judge Tighe knew, too, that whatever is done for the sick must be done by human agency. The time when men thought it creditable to believe a thing because it was impossible has passed.

These and the further one that men very commonly talk one way and act another, are the reasons, dear brother, why there is no Christian faith. Did you never hear of hypocrisy, conscious and unconscious?

A New Organization to Protect Our Schools.

The Protestant organization erstwhile known as the "Central Committee for Protecting and Perpetuating the Separation of Church and State," with headquarters in the Bible House, has now widened its scope and got itself incorporated under the laws of this state as the "National League for the Protection of American Institutions." Roman Catholics will please govern themselvs accordingly.

The only good the old organization ever did was to help defeat the Freedom of Worship bill in the legislature. The bill was in the interests of that large portion of the pope's flock which in early youth spends its days in Reformatories and in old age graduates to the Penitentiaries. This considerable portion of the Roman Catholic population consider—or rather their spiritual (and sometimes earthly) fathers consider—it a hardship and a persecution that they should not hav rooms in the reformatories and prisons set apart for their exclusiv use and fitted up with their peculiar paraphernalia of worship. The Freedom of Worship bill was designed for their relief in the matter; and it will no doubt be vigorously pressed at Albany this winter, for a great many good Catholics still get into jail, their peculiarity in this respect seeming to maintain a parallel with their increase in numbers and growth in grace. The new Protestant organization can probably be depended upon to oppose the bill now as of yore.

The main object of the new League, however, is said to be to secure amendments to the constitutions of every state in the Union which will prohibit the appropriation by the state of any money for sectarian schools. As almost every state has at present such provision in its organic law, which is evaded by voting money only to general religious schools, as in New York, or openly disregarded, as in Illinois in the instance of the St. Mary's Training School in Chicago, the formation of the League seems supererogatory so far as this work is concerned. Unless the demand is made that no public money shall be given to any religious school, there is no reform possible.

But this work we imagin is secondary to another purpose, which all real American citizens can heartily applaud. As stated by Hjalmer H. Boyesen, professor of German at Columbia College, to a Press reporter, one purpose of the League is to prevent appropriation of money to parochial schools. On this subject he said: "The common schools are those through which foreigners and the sons of foreigners should pass in order to become good American citizens, and we feel that the appropriation of state or national funds for the purpose of sustaining the parochial schools would serve, instead of making those who attend them American citizens, to raise up a second or third generation of foreigners in our midst, who would be just as ignorant of American institutions, and just as devoid of the true American feeling, as their ancestors, the emigrants, were. Look at Canada. It is afflicted with the Catholic parochial school system and the result is that there are two distinct nationalities, each hostil to the other, which instead of coöperating antagonize each other in all public movements. There is no fundamental feeling of nationality, and the result is there are two distinct peoples, the French Canadians and the English Canadians. The pernicious parochial school system is responsible for the fact that Canada is not a nation. In this country, the Irish, Germans, and Scandinavians are desirous of schools of their own. If this were permitted, in two or three generations we would hav Irish-Americans, German-Americans, and Scandinavian-Americans instead of American-Americans. In regard to the question of religious education in the schools, no sentiment either for or against has been expressed by the members of our organization. I presume that there are members in our league who are opposed to the reading of the Bible in the public schools and some who favor it, but that question can be postponed for future consideration. Our sole object now is the protection of the common school system from its enemies."

Mr. Boyesen, we believe, is a Freethinker, and no doubt his sentiments toward the Bible in the schools are honorable to him and fair toward other people. We wish we could think the same of the other organizers of the League. But the names given to the public as incorporated are those of men prominent in the work of the Evangelical Alliance and Protestant churches, and there is grave reason to fear that behind their interest in the public schools is a hope that Protestantism can through them be built up on the ruins of Catholicism. But be this as it may, the League will find plenty of opportunity to do the public a service in opposing Romanism, and, with Boyesen, we can leave the question whether it is a real simon-pure American organization or an appendage to the cohorts laboring for Senator Blair's Educational bill, to future consideration.

In the State of Washington.

We imagin that the lawmakers of the new state of Washington will find out before the session of the legislature closes that there are Freethinkers in their state as well as Christians. Many of them we hav reason to believe are themselvs Freethinkers, and the knowledge they are acquiring that thousands of their constituents share their sentiments will materially aid them in resisting the aggressiv, selfish, and unjust demands of the church. From three sources, by book, by picture, and by letter, the lawmakers hav been urged to do their duty, preserve their constitution, and do justice. THE TRUTH SEEKER has sent each member of the legislature a copy of a pamphlet showing the absurdity of Sunday laws. Mr. George Bowman, of Seattle, has had a picture made by Heston showing the injustice of exempting church property from taxation, to which are appended the protests of many prominent men against such exemption, and of which five thousand copies hav been distributed, not only to the members of the Washington legislature but to the members of all other legislatures of which he could obtain the membership list, and to prominent men in the state and to all leading ministers. Next, or perhaps first, the Walla Walla Liberal Club has furnished all the Liberals of the state that it has been able to reach with two circulars, to be by them dated and signed and sent to their members. The first is this:

"..... WASHINGTON, 1889.

"TO THE HON.....

"Olympia, Washington.

"DEAR SIR: As a member of your constituency, I would earnestly request that you oppose and use your best endeavors to defeat all legislation that may be introduced in the house or senate seeking to exempt church property from taxation, also all Sunday observance legislation, and would further ask your unqualified support and advocacy for the maintenance of our public school system, and refusal to be a party to the appropriation of the public funds to the support of any sectarian school or for any sectarian purpose.

"Feeling assured that the justice of my requests will meet your favorable consideration, I remain,

"Sincerely yours,

"....."

"I would respectfully refer to Article 1, Sections 11 and 12 of our constitution."

This is a good circular, though it would hav been better had the word "sectarian" been written "religious." It is easy enough to avoid the charge of appropriating money to sectarian or denominational schools, while just as flagrantly doing the taxpayers injustice by voting money to unsectarian but Christian schools. The other circular is as follows:

"Dec. 19, 1889.

"MY DEAR SIR: I would call your attention to the union of powerful church organizations and their avowed intention to influence legislation exempting church property from taxation, and to enforce rigid Sunday observance.

"These organizations are not laboring to secure or defend their rights, but to destroy the rights of others. They desire to effect union of church and state.

"To exempt any property from taxation is to increase the taxes on property not exempt.

"The fall elections testified that the people will resent all attempts to enforce Sunday or any other religious observances.

"Your friends are confident you will oppose and vote against every and all church or class legislation, so palpably unjust and contrary to our republican form of government.

"The recent action in regard to 'chaplains' indicates a disposition to ignore the constitution in the interests of priestcraft. This must not be. I call your attention to Article 1, Sections 11 and 12, of the constitution.

"Confident of your compliance, and that your concurrence will secure the continued hearty support of your friends and greatly increase their number, I remain,

"Yours for reason, right, and truth,

"....."

"'Keep church and state forever separate.'"

We call special attention to these circulars and efforts because they are good examples to be followed everywhere wherever there is a Liberal. By using such methods Liberals can concentrate their efforts and every individual protest will be utilized. No local organization is required. If there is but one Liberal in a town that one Liberal can make himself known and his influence felt. Every Liberal cannot do as much as Mr. Bowman has done, but he can at least write to his representativ and utter his remonstrance against the practical union of church and state now obtaining almost everywhere.

On January 28th, 29th, and 30th instant, there will be held at Seattle, in Turn Hall, a state convention of Liberals at which the issues of tax exemption and the religious observance of Sunday will be made prominent and protested against. The Walla Walla Liberal Club, which is the activ force in calling the convention, has received enthusiastic response from all parts of the state urging organization and promising support. Delegates hav been numerously appointed, and there is no doubt that the convention will be large and influential and hav some effect in shaping legislation. Dr. A. W. Calder is secretary of the club, and Liberals in Washington are requested to communicate with him at Walla Walla.

Activ Liberals; Discouraged Sabbatarians.

The California Liberal Union has issued a call for a state convention to be held at San Francisco January 25th and 26th, at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, for the purpose of discussing the issues forced upon the people by ecclesiastical encroachments. The chief issue upon which action is demanded is resisting the attempts of the church to procure the enactment of a Sunday law. The American Sabbath Association of California has "resolved to proceed at once with a vigorous and well-directed campaign to restore, by state legislation, the weekly day of rest to its proper position."

The fact that although California has no Sunday law, the weekly day of rest is unanimously observed by the Californians and used to the best advantage for obtaining healthful rest and recreation—each individual doing what seems good for himself and his best girl—has no weight with the pious fanatics of the state. They propose, if they can, to compel the people to go to church, or at least to abstain from going anywhere else, and to listen to a sermon and sacred music, or to pass the day in complete idleness.

Last year the California Liberals held a convention, and not only talked but worked against the Sabbath Association. That practical good resulted from their efforts we now find acknowledged by the Sabbatarians themselvs. In the Christian Statesman of December 19th, N. R. Johnson, of Oakland, one of the prominent members of the Association, complains as follows. The letter is so cheering to the friends of liberty that we print it entire:

"EDITORS CHRISTIAN STATESMAN: Optimist or pessimist? That's the question. I wish you would send some of your optimistic National Reform district secretaries out to California and let them try their hand at Sabbath Reform among these people who don't believe in any law except the law of liberty to do as you please.

"At my last writing I hoped to be able ere this to communicate something very encouraging as to the progress of our Sabbath cause in this state, but in common with others I hav been disappointed. Ever since the state convention, held while Dr. Wilbur Crafts was here, when a large executiv committee was appointed, the interest in the cause has seemed to be growing less. I am not sure that I see the philosophy of it, but I fear that it is partly the result of the agreement to leave out of view the divine authority and the religious feature of the reform—to work only for a 'Civil Sunday law' in the interests of laboring humanity, to ignore the claims of the moral law of God, to ask a law securing rest to the weary laborer, and not to demand a law in obedience to him who commands, Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. To use the 'left arm,' the civil side, only, and let the pulpits use the 'right arm,' the religious side, as Dr. Crafts everywhere urges, was, and is, a very popular idea in California when Secularism is on the throne. Whether the absence of a Sabbath law and the prevalence of Sabbath desecration, together with the general apathy of the masses, tends to induce carelessness on the part of the ministers and Christian people may not be certain, but it is manifest that, unless there can be awakened more earnestness and a heartier coöperation on the part of church-members, it will be a long time before California will hav any Sabbath law or any better Sabbath observance.

"Ever since our executiv committee got into good working order we hav been trying to devise ways and means by which to secure Rev. Dr. Crafts as our state field secretary for at least part of the year, and we hav been in correspondence with him to this end. But we hav failed. At our meeting this afternoon the effort was abandoned. Our next plan is to call two or three of the best available California laborers into the field and endeavor to leaven the entire state with Sabbath truth. What may be done will depend somewhat upon the character of the report of our finance committee at our next meeting. It is hard to be hopeful, so few good people see in the awful and increasing Sabbath desecration any cause for alarm. Whether we will ever again hav any kind of a law in favor of any kind of a Sabbath is very doubtful, and I suppose that for this lamentable state of affairs very much is due to the liquor power, presumably the most potent power in the state."

That's a good letter; we like it, and its reading givs us great hope. It is evident that the people of California see through the shallow hypocrisy of the Sabbatarians who, under cloak of a "civil Sunday," are endeavoring to obtain a religious Sunday. The civil Sunday they already hav, without any law, and by general consent. There is no danger of its being taken away from them; but if a religious Sunday is created by statute, the liberty of the people will be taken away. But it would be better a thousand times that some individuals should pursue their vocations on Sunday than to hav the liberty of one man infringed. No set of men can force labor on three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, law or no law; the whole world would revolt. But when the Sabbatarians can control the government, we know from experience just what they will do, and the people submit because they are fooled into believing it to be God's will. Look at New England, in the smaller cities and in the towns, where the church people rule! The communities rest under a pall one-seventh of the time. The men hav to thrust their fishing-rods down their trousers-legs and walk stiff-kneed to get out of town to the brooks, or congregate in some armory or clubroom and fill themselvs full of nicotine and poor rum obtained by the way of the back door of the drug-store. Even Sunday papers are unknown, or smuggled in on a night train and sold by a boy with the drooping manner of a sneak thief. Sunday laws, when enforced, hav a direct and decided immoral effect; when not enforced they are of course useless, besides creating disgust toward all laws. It is because we hav so many useless, unjust, tyrannical, and partial laws, that thousands of people are now crying out against the state as the source of more evil than it restrains. And of all the needless and tyrannical laws on the statute-books of all the states, none are so grossly invasiv of personal liberty, so detrimental to the prosperity of a community, so prolific in breeding hypocrisy and general discontent, as the Sunday laws. They are the concentrated essence of selfishness and despotic meanness. The clergy advocate them because they cannot get a congregation when the people hav perfect freedom to go elsewhere; they contend for them to maintain the ascendency of their superstition; and they will fight for them—by proxy—because they know, as Parker Pillsbury said, that with the going of the Sunday laws will go their reverend and holy selvs.

The Pictures.

Still the letters come upon the subject of the illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and still the great majority are in favor of their continuance, but still the new subscribers sent, although numerous, fall far short of the number necessary to enable us to continue them.

As so many are interested in the subject, as the matter is very important, and as it takes so many days to hear from our friends, scattered as they are over the country from Maine to California, and from Washington to Texas, we cannot settle the question at once; and so continue the pictures into the New Year, hoping earnestly that the responses will enable us to continue them through the other fifty-one weeks, and away into dim futurity.

There is no need of our presenting the good and bad points of the matter. The writers of the "Letters from Friends" hav done that fully. As the presiding officers of parliamentary bodies announce, The Question is now before the House.

THE workingmen of Melbourne, Australia, led by the Secularists, are determined to hav the Free Library in that city open on Sunday. To this end, they assemble before the building every Sunday, remaining there for a while and then adjourning to a vacant lot where they are addressed by several speakers. About two thousand people were in the procession on a recent Sunday.

Letters from Friends.

FORT LEWIS, COL., Dec. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find herein postal note for $1.50, to pay for the ensuing half year. By all means keep the pictures up and the monkey, too. JAMES MCDONALD.

VINELAND, KAN., Dec. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find money order for $16 to be credited to four renewals and four new subscribers. Hoping the pictures will be continued in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I remain, Respectfully, J. A. PEARSON.

BUTLER, PA., Dec. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A friend of mine says he will subscribe provided you continue to publish the cartoons, which I hope you will, as I do not think Mr. Heston can make a design ridiculous enough to compare with the Bible.

Very truly yours, J. O. FULLERTON.

PEDEE, WIS., Dec. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am of the opinion that the pictures are of more harm than good to the paper. As for myself, I would rather hav the paper without them. Run the paper to suit you, and as long as it is run in the same rut that it has been since the start at Paris you can count in

DAN BROBST.

FLORENCE, COL., Dec. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Finding that I am in arrears I herewith inclose post-office order for $5.25. Please apply the $5 on my subscription, and send me the ANNUAL for 1890. I, too, hav great respect for the opinions of James Parton, but must say that I should be sorry to see the pictures discontinued.

Yours very truly, ORANGE WHITE.

MARIETTA, O., Dec. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to protest against dropping the pictures from THE TRUTH SEEKER, as they do more good and cause more people to stop and think than half a dozen of our best and ablest writers can. I am willing to pay more for THE TRUTH SEEKER per year, if necessary, to hav the pictures continued. Yours for liberty, DR. OGDEN.

CARBONADO, WASH., Dec. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Having noticed your appeal to subscribers in arrears and knowing that my time expired in September, I hasten to comply by forwarding you a post-office order for $2.

I like the cartoons very much, but will not kick if their place is filled with reading matter. You are the boss.

Yours for progress, GRIFF LLOYD.

WOODSTOCK, VT., Dec. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $6.25, for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year $3, and for Mr. Heston $3. I do not want the pictures to stop if it does hurt the orthodox feeling to know such things are told in the Bible. I presume they are ignorant that there are such stories written there. Keep them a-going; they may know something by this. JOHN D. POWERS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Can you not get up a large separate issue of the cartoon, "When Womanhood Awakes," in your last issue? I am willing to take $5 worth of copies to distribute among my lady friends. If you retain the heading above the picture, it will be an excellent advertisment for your paper. I should think it would be better to hav nothing on the back of the picture. APOSTLE.

MCDONALD'S MILL, GA., Dec. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Truth Seeker Company will please forward me one of the last week's issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I lost my last week's paper before I got to read it. I do not want to lose a single number. Tell Mr. Heston I hav a boy two weeks old named for him. I admire his illustrations very much. You will also find inclosed fifteen cents for "Bible Contradictions." W. D. WISEMAN.

HENDERSON, MINN., Dec. 16, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Looking on the tab I find that I am late already in paying for my subscription in advance. Here is post-office order for $3.25. Send the ANNUAL. Do not stop the cartoons. I am sorry I cannot send you a new subscriber from this bigoted place, but the walls of my office are covered with Heston's witty sketches. This is the only way I hav found to show to my patients the ridiculous side of their Holy Queer. H. J. SEIGNERET, M.D.

LA PLATTE, N. M., Dec. 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Noticing your appeal for funds and the response of Mr. Parton in reply, I would say that the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER are at least the biggest half in putting my paper around among people who never read one. I notice the pictures catch their attention first, then they are induced to read the paper, and people who at first would scarcely notice the paper, come now to my house to borrow them. GEORGE H. EVERSOLE.

CALHOUN, ARK., Dec. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $3.25 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER and a copy of the ANNUAL for the year 1890. For me to suggest to you how to conduct THE TRUTH SEEKER would be impertinence in me. But please let me say I do not think the pictures add any value to the paper. They "repel" probably "more than they attract."

I should be more than pleased to send you a subscriber, but here if you are not a church-member and a Democrat you are nobody. They rather boast of the solid South, and when it comes to church matters it is solid ignorance. In regard to the Exposition, whichever city will open it to visitors on Sunday, that is the place; and if we are not advanced that far, why, dispense with it.

Yours fraternally, JOHN H. HASLAM.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Dec. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: My time is not up, but being fifty-two to-day I will celebrate the event by inclosing $5 for two years ahead, $1 for the Secular Union, and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. As to the illustrations, while I believe the pro's are in the majority ten to one, I would suggest a compromise, a respectful concession to the feelings of the anti's, by modifying the objectionable features, making the characters less grotesque, etc. S. R. SHEPHERD.

MURRAY, IDA., Dec. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order for $3 60 for which you will renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, and for the balance send the "Field-Ingersoll Discussion." I see that some do not like the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but, for my part, I think they are good and are doing more good than harm. Let every one say whether they like them or not, and go according to the majority. Yours with respect, J. A. ERVIN.

ALBION, IDA., Dec. 13, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find fifty cents, for which please send me two copies of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and two copies of your catalog of Freethought books.

I am sorry to hear that you may be compelled to discontinue the pictures. I would rather pay fifty cents a year more for the paper than miss having them. I will do my very best to get you some new subscribers. Hoping you can continue the paper as it is, I am,

Very respectfully, LEE K. MOORE.

ROSCOE, ME., Dec. 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I consider the communication of James Parton in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 7th an insult to the patrons of your paper. He says that people who like the pictures ought to be religious—that they are capable of nothing better. Now, I am bound to believe that he is religious, judging by what experience I hav had in the past, for I find that all the religious people that I hav shown the said pictures were like him; that is, they did not like them. Giv me the pictures, by all means. A. J. HOLMES.

PORT HOPE, Dec. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office order for $5.25, to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the years 1890 and 1891, and the odd twenty-five cents for the "Agnostic Annual," which please acknowledge. The illustrations in the paper are good, and it was the pictures that induced me to again commence taking the paper; but very likely Mr. Parton is about half right with respect to the general effect of them. I did not try to get an additional subscriber, but think two years in advance will be about as good as if I had.

Very truly, JOHN HELM.

HALLOWELL, ME., Dec. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 to pay for the continuance of THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address. I hope to be able to subscribe again when the time arrives. Do not leave out the cartoons; better leave out half the reading. They preach more than words. THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other Liberal papers, are opening the eyes of all except Catholics; they are too numb to comprehend anything above the brutes I fear they may get the power and ruin the country. With best wishes for your prosperity, I am,

A Liberal Spiritualist, EMELINE A. PRESCOTT.

GRANTFORK, ILL., Dec. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for another year's subscription. I cannot do without it any more. Everyone in the family is eager to get it first when the mail comes. Those pictures are immense and good. Do not drop the pictures, otherwise I might drop the paper. If some of our Liberal friends do object to them somewhat, the pictures are all too true and founded on facts, and anything that is true should not be denied. Please find also twenty-five cents for a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. Wishing you success, I remain, Fraternally yours, ANTON J. KRAFT.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I see some controversy as regards to your pictures in the paper. I am well pleased with them, but as I am only a new subscriber I do not wish to dictate, but I will be one of one hundred who will giv $100 for King James's Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, with three or four small pictures on each page, as circumstances admit, none to be immoral or too vulgar; I will giv $100 for such a Bible. Why hav we not the same right as the Christians? They hav pictures of the Bible. I think it would be a great benefit toward reforming the world if they were scattered over it. Inclosed find $2 for books. L. E. ALLEN.

BRAGVILLE, MASS., Dec. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I like the paper very much, but did not realize to what an exten; until I missed one copy. Now to show that I am in favor of Heston's cartoons being continued, please find check inclosed for two new subscribers. If everyone would do a little work the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER might be doubled in two months. So far from the pictures being an injury, they are a great help in getting new subscribers. I keep my papers on file and some months ago I had a good Baptist call on me. I took down a lot of papers and showed him the pictures, and it did not kill or even make him mad. Some time after I saw him he told me he had come to the conclusion that the church had caused more bloodshed than any other one thing. T. N. SHERMAN.

STERLING, KAN., Dec. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find money order for $6 to renew my subscription, and for one extra copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address to help out the pictures. Do not giv up Heston and his pictures if you can help it. Also the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890.

Our population, about twenty-five hundred, has eleven ministers to support, with a secretary for the Young Men's Christian Association at $40 per month, also a Young Women's Christian Association attachment to the same. It is my opinion that Kansas has more carpet-bag ministers than any other spot on earth. I. W. GOODSON.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Dec. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am so anxious the pictures should remain a fixture in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I am doing all I can to help along. I hav not yet obtained a subscriber, but I shall keep trying and think I will succeed. Meanwhile I hav sent on for books—$15 in money in advance—so as not to lose my chance of helping. THE TRUTH SEEKER without the pictures would lose half its value for me. They are object-lessons that impress for life. I hope every reader will send something, or buy some books and help in some way. Do not wait, but do it now. We can double the income of the paper if we only determin we will. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

COALVILLE, UTAH, Dec. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find a postal note worth $3 25, to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER and TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. If you cannot make the paper a financial success with the cartoons, would it not be a failure without them? I find the young are more interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER pictures than in any other pictures I receive. They seem to hav the desired effect of impressing a disregard to what is called the sacred teachings of the Bible and the Christian religion.

I hav tried to get new subscribers for your paper, and shall renew my efforts in your behalf, providing the illustrations are continued. THOMAS J. WELCH.

BUTLER, IND., Dec. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Seeing in the last few issues that you would discontinue the pictures unless the circulation of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER was increased I started out to do a little missionary work. By all means keep Heston at work, and I will do all in my power to get subscribers for the best paper in America. There are only a few genuin Liberals in this vicinity, but we never falter. Now and then we get into a discussion with a sky-pilot, but we generally do him up, with his old musty, ancient, mythical creed. Inclosed find $7, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER to three new subscribers for one year. Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

JOHN SAUVEL.

BARRE, MASS., Dec. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am deeply interested in the discussion over the cartoons, and will add my feeble testimony in their favor, and will hereafter contribute something for their continuance. While I can appreciate the opinions and feelings of those who are opposed to them, because they fear the resentment and ostracism of their Christian friends and neighbors, I hav no admiration for the truckling cowardice that cannot bear the sneers and holy indignation of the enemies of science, and the worshipers of tradition, myth, and superstition. Suppose Bruno and the scientific martyrs of old had exercised the same selfish policy, where would hav been the civilization of to-day, with all its inventions, improvement, art, and philosophy? Again I plead for the cartoons, and a liberal compensation to the ingenious artist and sincere Freethinker, Watson Heston. ELLA E. GIBSON.

WABASHA, MINN., Dec. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for two years' subscription, the old expiring on the 20th inst., and I do not want to miss a copy, as I am getting them bound, making a handsome, as well as most entertaining, book.

I am glad to notice the favor with which that notable feature, the pictures, are received by the majority of the answers published. They should be continued if for no other purpose than to hold up the image of the Bible's teachings to those who will not read, but still see the absurdity in the pictures. Without wishing to be forward, yet believing it would be agreeable to every subscriber, I would suggest that, in some number in the coming new year, you would giv us a galaxy in the way of portraits of the leading champions of Freethought, provided such a thing can be done without inconvenience to yourselvs. W. H. HINERLAND.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: For several numbers past in THE TRUTH SEEKER an inquiry has been progressing, "Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?" The fact that he was not a Christian in the proper acceptation of the word I think is pretty well established, although all that is practically good in the term he practiced. But a still greater enormity confronts the bigoted Christian when he is told that Mr. Lincoln was not afraid and did look into the subject of Spiritualism. Meeting my old friend Mr. John B. Conklin, the noted public medium, one day in the street unexpectedly, he remarked, "I hav just returned from Washington, from Uncle Abe's, where we had at the White House several private sittings. What effect the intelligence has had upon him I don't know; but in leaving he took me by the hand and remarked, 'Mr. Conklin, any time you are this way consider yourself a welcome guest at my house.'" I do not know whether Conklin ever went to Washington again; but I hav heard other mediums hav.

Keep right on with Brother Heston. There is nothing like pictorial literature. Yours truly, DAVID BRUCE.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Dec. 21, 1889

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $2; please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890, and credit me with the balance on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I see that there is a great difference of opinion about the pictures. I am decidedly in favor of them. I think they are what is needed. How would it do to put the pictures on a separate page, so that those persons who do not want pictures can cut them out without destroying the reading matter? I think the Bible pictures on the back of the paper are very good. I would like to hav a collection of them in book form. I always giv my paper away after I read it. Sometimes I am sorry to part with the pictures, but do not want to mutilate the paper or I would cut them out and put them in a scrapbook. With best wishes for your success, Yours truly, GEORGE NAILOR.

LISBON, IA., Dec. 22, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am very sorry to learn that there are thoughts of discontinuing the cartoons of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I think that they are doing much good. They attract the attention of many who would otherwise not notice the paper, thus furnishing food for thought and awakening an interest in the subjects discussed in the editorials and communications contained within. Such interest being once aroused, it is not difficult to retain it, considering the excellence of the matter the paper contains and the importance of each subject to the welfare of the human race. The cartoons are missionaries, and I hope to see them continued, and inclose order for $1 to aid in their perpetuation. If, however, the thing proves impossible, the money may be used in whatever way you deem best for the advancement of the cause of Freethought. Yours, with great hopes for the triumph of Truth, A. LAURIE SAILOR.

BRACKETTVILLE, TEX., Dec. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: At your invitation permit me to say a word or two in behalf of the illustrations that appear in your paper. For my part they are half the paper to me, and I look for the pictures as expectantly as I do for the paper itself. In my humble opinion, the cuts are an evidence of advancement, and you certainly do not wish to turn back. We can look a few years in the past, when wood-cuts were a novelty, and only a few weeklies and a few costly magazines produced them at all. Now we find them in nearly all our dailies. Nothing can be so well told otherwise as by an illustration. The architect produces his drawings, the sculptor has his model, the sky with its millions of stars is a picture, and nature has told us nothing of herself or her laws except what we hav gathered from her many shapes, forms, and colors. Now as THE TRUTH SEEKER and its contributors rank among the foremost in reasoning and in advancement, I see no reason why Mr. Heston should not be given an opportunity of showing up to the world, in the best possible manner, the absurdities of the Christian religion.

Respectfully, SAM MORIN.

PITTSFIELD, ILL., Dec. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The pro and con opinions of your readers regarding Heston's cartoons are read by me with interest. I am sure the pictures hav increased the circulation and sale of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and I could in support of this claim "several tales unfold." Any Christian who could be "repelled," as Mr. Parton puts it, by these splendid object-lessons, can never be converted to Liberalism, for they are of the dyed-in-wool order. Mr. Heston, I believe, strives to make each picture a lesson, and I think he succeeds admirably. In the postscript to a letter I received from him, dated July 1st, he says: "I am always glad to get any items or suggestions of this kind, for it is a constant grind and a tiresome task to twist subjects into such shape that they will hav point enough to teach a lesson. I assure you I hav no picnic to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER supplied. There are many subjects I would like to sketch, but cannot well do so and avoid making them offensiv to the timid ones, and must drop them altogether." E. D. HICKS.

TACOMA, WASH., Dec. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find postal note for $3.25 for one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER (twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL), as my subscription expired on the 15th inst., and I hope we can keep Brother Heston in the field, as his illustrations are doing a great good. Those who would not read the paper will look at the pictures, and it has a telling effect. I will here pledge myself to send at least one new subscriber or $2 in cash by the 15th of January, and if each subscriber will contribute his or her mite, we can keep the old hero at work.

Now, brothers, let us hear from you! I am also glad to hear from Brother Winter again. Brother Peck's articles hav the right ring; they strike right from the shoulder. Theology is right or it is wrong. The sooner the truth is demonstrated the better. Hew to the line; let the chips fall where they may. We hav a fair footing here in Washington, and intend to keep it. Respectfully yours for truth and justice, J. N. NEWMAN.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A merry Christmas. Brother Peck is after the Spiritualists. As you hav published his invitations and requests I, as a Spiritualist, respond for his gratification, and out of courtesy to him for the interest he takes in the subject. I could hav said plainer, harsher things, but will leave that for others. Perhaps you will indulge him and your Spiritual readers with the perusal of it. Peck and Winter and others are hard on the Spiritualists, and their course will never convert or enlighten them. We want the gulf bridged over that keeps them so wide apart and hostil.

You ask for an opinion of the pictures. I scarcely hav one to giv. They do not hurt me. They are vivid and luminous and will move the minds of readers, especially the more stolid, the young, and the humorous. The Bible illustrations are so good that Bible worshipers ought to welcome them. Sunday-school teachers could find nothing more effectiv in fixing Bible stories in the mind and memory of children. They all excite my risibles hugely, but I will not vote, not knowing how to vote wisely. T. E. LONGSHORE.

GLANFORD, ONT., Dec. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Just a few words anent the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think promptness in paying for your paper shows a good trait in a man's character. Your noble paper should be paid for in advance, religion or no religion. We should allow liberty of taste. I think the pictures are immense. I used, when a boy, to be better pleased with an illustrated Bible than with one without the pictures, but then they left a holy horror in the mind. Now, Watson Heston's are complete. They show the absurdities at a glance. What could show the Calvinistic creed better than "The Glory of Predestination" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 30th?

O thou who in the heavens dost dwell,
Who as it pleases best thysel',
Sends one to heaven and ten to hell,
A' for thy glory,
And no for any good or ill
They've done before thee.

Then, the history of Samson is grand. So was the history of Jonah. Heston is a Hogarth. Now, for me to get a new subscriber for your paper is beyond my power, as I liv in a hot-bed of orthodoxy. I once lent a few copies to a friend to read, but during my friend's absence his wife committed the whole lot to the stove. But, am willing to pay $3 50 for my next year's paper on March 8, 1890. And I shall pay in advance. I shall not keep you sending your paper till my account reaches the sum of $6. Mr. Parton has, like Samson, stirred a bumblebees' nest. With wishes to friends in Universal Mental Liberty, I remain, JOHN MCCLEMONT.

HOWARD, N. Y., Nov. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I think that every Freethinker or friend of mental liberty should as much as express his opinion or belief, both public and private, in regard to Christianity and morality, or anything that will tend to break the bands of mental slavery. Christianity does and ever has claimed morality as its right-hand bower and twin sister, and I see that some of your correspondents accept the idea. But Christianity and morality hav no connection. They do not belong in the same pew. One is a principle of thought, action, and deed; the other is simply faith, and a belief in Jesus Christ as the son of God and supreme ruler, his crucifixion and resurrection. Or for a more full and explicit explanation, I will designate two persons as B and C for instance. B is honest, charitable, truthful, good, and just in every particular—in fact, never was known to do a wrong thing in all his life. C may be right to the reverse, a liar, a thief, a robber, and a murderer, and say he candidly and sincerely believes on Jesus Christ the son of God and supreme ruler, and his crucifixion and resurrection. B may say he does not believe one word of it; it is all a sham and a farce. C is the Christian and B is not. For the truthfulness of the above statement I simply ask, Was there ever a recognized strictly moral person whose morality rested simply on a belief in one particular thing, regardless of acts or deeds?

Hundreds of millions of dollars are used annually to support what we may call nothing. How much better it would be if a part, at least, could be used to support schools of scientific studies. We hav been taught hundreds if not thousands of years about gods, heaven, and hell, and mansions in the skies. Is there a person on earth that can say he knows one jot more about that nothing—or something, if he wishes to call it—than his father or grandfather did?

A word about the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would say continue them by all means, if it can be afforded. In short, Mr. Carlton Rice in last week's TRUTH SEEKER covers the whole ground of my full sentiment.

W. C. BISHOP.

NORTH BENTON, O., Nov. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: According to President Harrison this is a national holiday. Our pious brethren tried to celebrate the day at North Benton. The different churches united to make a show. They chose the smallest church in the village for their exercises, and imported a D.D. from Mount Union to officiate. With their united effort they succeeded in about one-quarter filling the house, and the hearers were three parts women. I hav seen several theological revolutions in these parts within the last fifty-five years. Slavery was justified. Infant damnation was preached. Rumsellers were justified; the bulk of the deacons belonged to that class. I heard deacons testify in a debate with other denominations that infant damnation was never preached in the Presbyterian church. I hav heard church-members perjure themselvs in courts of justice and commit subornation of perjury to screen themselvs and their fellow-Christians. Two church-members that affirmed in North Benton were hanged on account of murder. And in fact, nearly all the crimes known to the laws of the land hav been practiced by church-members. No wonder they want a redeemer to dump their sins on every few days.

I see that the Presbyterian church in their late conference hav come to the conclusion that infants of unbelievers hav gone to heaven, and they appointed three of their number to revise their creed and strike out the objectionable part of their decrees. And thus they make a religion and call it divine.

I do not say there are no good persons who belong to the church. I believe there are. But the church did not make them good.

The church is a tissue of falsehoods. My trip in the Old World last summer strengthened my faith that the decay of old systems of religion of different kinds, and of the most nonsensical stripe, is evidence of its human invention.

It is not necessary for the church to teach falsehood in order to cause people to do right. In my judgment the love and beauty of doing right ought to be incentiv enough to induce the human race to do right.

For inclosed money send "Giordano Bruno: His Life, Works, Martyrdom, Portrait, and Monument," and credit the rest on my subscription. CHESTER BEDELL.

BOZEMAN, MONT., Dec. 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav always considered it the business of the editor of a paper to conduct its publication to suit himself. I hav never expected or desired it conducted in a way to suit all my fastidious notions; wishing, in the main, only for a live publication with an editor with a backbone and nerve to fearlessly say what he thinks and state all the facts so far as known, without regard to whether it will please me or not. However, since you hav called on your subscribers for an expression of opinion with reference to the picture department, I will reluctantly answer to the call. So far as my experience goes, I do not believe "the pictures repel more than they attract;" neither do I believe "people who like them ought to be religious; they are capable of nothing better"—even if the declaration does come from high authority. Certainly Mr. Parton has a perfect right to the expression of his opinion about pictures or any other subject. But in this particular instance his manner of expression certainly is objectionable and no doubt many Liberals will feel themselvs aggrieved. It is always with sorrow I read harsh words of Liberals when engaged in discussion. I discover that men can much more readily divest themselvs of the superstition of Christianity than of its pernicious effects, and when we still see it clinging to a good man like Mr. Parton in dogmatic language of an offensiv character, all the more striking is the evidence of the tenacity of its lamentable effects. Were you aiming to giv your paper a lofty aristocratic tone, suited to aristocratic circles of society—such a one as was a few years ago, and now is no more—cartoons, I think, would be out of place. But if the paper is intended for the great mass of readers of every shade of thought and desire, then, in my opinion, they will not "repel more than they attract." Why is it that our great political newspapers resort to cartoons during a political campaign if they are of such a repellant nature? Is it not that their use is thought the more effectiv method of reaching the masses? So far as I am concerned, conduct your paper to suit yourself. Then you will hav the consolation of knowing there is one man in this wide world pleased. Whatever may be the fate of the cartoons, THE TRUTH SEEKER will still be good enough for me, and I shall not trouble its Editor with directions how to run it. I am well aware that you only wanted my vote, but you see you hav got plenty more at the same time. Send catalog of books. THOMAS BURK.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Dec. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose a check payable to you or order, of $5 75, for the following: Seventy-five cents is due you for forwarding twice last January Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods," and TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I sold the two extra copies and now return you the cash. The $5 is a renewal of my subscription, which expires on Jan. 14, 1890, for one year, and a new subscriber for one year. As to pictures or no pictures, you are in a better position to decide than I am, and I simply ask you to do your duty in this matter to the best interests of the cause, the same as I shall try, though they are favorits and first examined in my family.

While it seems unwise to offend Christians where we can do as much good with their good will, yet in my opinion we may as well surrender at once as let them dictate our line of defense. True, they hav now, in fact, as an intelligent body of men and women, abandoned the geography, astronomy, and medical profession of the Bible, and there is hope of still further enlightenment just as soon as all become aware of their situation. They and their children now study and believe in the same geography as ours do, and use the same almanacs and astronomies as we do, because they are based upon demonstrated facts, and send for the same order of physicians when sick as we do. Does not this show that we are very much alike after all in our acts, if some profess to believe different? And how do you think these honest men and women—for I know they are honest—will feel when they realize their inconsistency; that they, with all their honesty, hav lived a lying life in reality to please the devotees of the religion of the Dark Ages?

In case there should be a better life beyond this, would it be a good preparation for it to liv a regular liar here, as all do who say they believe all between the lids of the Bible to be true? Will they say they believe a thing to be true and then always act as those who believe it a lie? Let us try to be true if possible with ourselvs. With us our most intelligent and successful, as well as moral, men are very indifferent about church matters, except that when pressed by the continual beggars of the church they still chip in in order to please them and the church, so as not to be outlawed by the church; for do not forget it, the church still persecutes to the extent of her power the same as in the Dark Ages. And as long as she stands on such lying foundations as I hav shown she does, she can't afford to hear both sides of the question like all people who stand upon truth only.

Respectfully yours, JOHN M. GROH.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Five Cents a Drink.

Five cents a drink! does anyone think
That that is really the price of a drink?
"Five cents a glass!" I hear you say.
"Why, that isn't very much to pay."
Ah, no, indeed! 'tis a very small sum
You are passing over 'twixt finger and thumb;
And if that were all you gave away
It wouldn't be very much to pay!

The price of a drink? Let him decide
Who has his courage lost and his pride,
And lies a groveling heap of clay,
Not far removed from a beast to-day.
The price of a drink! let that one tell
Who sleeps to-night in a murderer's cell.
Honor and virtue, love and truth,
All the glory and pride of youth,
Hopes of manhood, the wealth of fame,
High endeavor and noble aim;
These are the treasures thrown away
As the price of a drink from day to day.

The price of a drink! If you want to know
What some are willing to pay for it, go
Through that wretched tenement over there,
With dingy windows and broken stair.
There poverty dwells with her hungry brood,
Wild-eyed creatures for lack of food;
There shame in a corner crouches low;
There violence deals its cruel blow;
And innocent ones are thus accursed
To pay the price of another one's thirst.

"Five cents a glass!" Oh, if that were all,
The sacrifice would indeed be small!
But the money's worth is the least amount
We pay; and whoever will keep an account
Will learn the terrible waste and blight
That follows that ruinous appetite.
"Five cents a glass!" Does anyone think
That that is really the price of a drink?

Objects Personified.

Georgie: "Mamma, how did Uncle Sam get his position at Washington?"

Mamma: "His position! Do you think Uncle Sam a real person?"

Georgie: "Why, yes; havn't I seen his picture? He is an oldish man that is boss, isn't he?"

Mamma: "Well, he has had his one hundredth birthday celebrated thirteen years ago last Fourth of July, but his portrait represents him as in middle age. He is but an imaginary person, possessing U. S. for his initials, which means United States, sometimes personified as Uncle Sam, sometimes as Brother Jonathan; just as England is designated as John Bull.

"Objects are often personified in poetry, as 'Mother Earth,' 'Father Time,' etc. Love, Joy, Hope and Fear, Good and Evil, hav often been pictured as persons. The quality of goodness all admire. In poetry, admiration would be intensified as worship and good become God. Pious people hav changed the pronunciation to Gawd, with a capital letter as extra-sacred, to distinguish their worship from the profane ones who call upon goodness or god, simply to make their words seem more emphatic.

"Objects personified often seem real to the ignorant—so much so that laws hav been passed with penalties attached as a punishment to those who 'take the name of God in vain'—which should mean when God does not notice or answer the call. And it is my private opinion publicly expressed, that no one can prove an answer ever has been given. Appeals to goodness in the human heart hav been answered ad infinitum.

"In olden times, when books were scarce and learning was possible only to the few, writing was believed to be inspiration of good, as it undoubtedly was, until dishonest people played on the fears of ignorance by making them believe the unreal to be true and derived revenue from their fears."

In that golden age, all the Wealth of the East
Was brought in exchange for the Prayers of the priest;
The priests were lords, lived
Happy and well;
And sinners were prayed for and
Kept out of hell.
CHO.: When the world becomes wise,
And the fools are all dead,
We'll quit preaching lies
And work for our bread.

A. M. REED.

Caraccas Spanish.

A correspondent of the Chicago News writes from Caraccas detailing some of his laughable experiences with the Spanish language as it is there spoken. Some of the most amusing of these curiosities of language are on the bills of fare.

One item that appeared almost daily was "garden eggs." We studied over this for a time, and finally, out of curiosity, we ordered some. It turned out to be egg plant.

Another puzzle was "papas en camisas." A "camisa" means in ordinary speech a night-shirt or the jacket of a pajama, and the natural inference seemed to be that we had landed among a set of cannibals, who were serving up somebody's papa in his night-shirt.

But "papas" in Spanish means potatoes, and this mysterious article of food proved to be nothing more dreadful than steamed potatoes with the skins, or jackets, on.

A cantaloupe is called a "melone," and the word as pronounced sounds very much like the name of a numerous and highly respected Irish family. It made us laugh to call for a "maloney," and we thought it still more amusing when we heard a woman's bonnet called "begorra."

But there are queerer things than this in the Spanish language. The pupil of the eye, for example, is "the little girl of the eye," and the nostrils—not quite so poetical a subject—are "the windows of the nose."

The "dado" is the finger, and the thumb is "la dado pulgar." "Pulga" means flea, and the thumb therefore is the "flea finger"—a fact which illustrates one of the principal occupations of the people.

Correspondence.

CAMPTOWN, PA., Dec. 1, 1889.

MISS WIXON: We all read the Children's Corner, and think it is doing much good. I hav written a conversation which I had with Georgie—aged twelve—which you can make use of if you think it is suitable for the Corner. Yours for truth, ADDIE M. REED.

GALVESTON, TEX., Dec. 14, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter. I will be eight years old on the 26th of this month. I hav been going to school for six months. I am in the First Reader and arithmetic. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to look at the pictures.

Your little friend, ROBERT E. PALMS.

ORANGE CITY, IA., Dec. 16, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was pleased to see my first letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav the mumps, and I hav to stay in the house. I do not like to stay in the house. I would not care if I did not hav to lie down.

I hav a little cousin three years old; she is as naughty as ten other children. I hav been down sick three days—it is mumps. Mumps are everywhere. My jaws look as big as the chaps of a hog. I looked at myself yesterday and I had to laugh.

Yours, FREDDIE DE LESPINASSE.

EAGLE HARBOR, WASH., Dec. 7, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This afternoon I will write a letter for the Children's Corner. I go to school and study the Third Reader and the speller. I am seven years old. We hav a very tiny baby that can only sit on the floor. If I see this in the paper I will write again some time. My papa takes the paper, and has been taking it for a long time. My grandpa takes it also. I am not very tall for my age. We hav a little bird; it is yellow on its back and stomach. My brothers are very little, all except Clatie; he is a very big boy. C. B. Reynolds lectured in the school-house last week, and my papa and mamma and grandpa went to hear him; it was grand.

Good-bye, IRENE WILLIAMS.

HAY SPRINGS, NEB., Dec. 15, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav written to THE TRUTH SEEKER but twice. I am twelve years old to-day. I hav just written to the Nonconformist. Mrs. V. Vincent says she wants the children to write a letter to the Nonconformist before Christmas. I see so many boys and girls that want other boys and girls to correspond with them. I will write to any boy or girl that will write to me. I hav not been absent or tardy this or last term of school. We hav had three months and three weeks of school, and will hav one more week this term. We will hav two weeks' vacation after this week. We liv a half mile out of town. I hope this will not hav to go to the wastebasket. I hav two brothers and one sister. I will close for this time.

Yours respectfully, JUDGE M. MINER.

WHEELING, W. VA., Dec. 14, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been quite a while since I wrote for the Corner. I like to read the little pieces in the Corner. I am glad to say I am a Liberal. I was present at a Liberal meeting. Pa made a speech. I will be glad when I get big; then I will make speeches, too. I was going to Sunday-school and I soon got tired of doctrins heard there, and I do not like to go to school and hav the teacher pray. Pa teaches us at home. We learn more at home than going to school. I hav two sisters. Their ages are fourteen and seven. My oldest sister keeps house for us. I hav no mother. Mr. Remsburg lectured here last evening to a small but intelligent-looking audience. His subject was "False Claims of the Church." I liked his lecture very well. I guess the church folks did not like it. My sisters and my pa were there. Pa is going to write for another speaker to come some time this winter. We ought to keep the Liberal ball rolling. If we do not, what little freedom we hav will be taken away from us. Pa is secretary of the Secular Union which has just been started here. If some of the Liberal boys and girls will write to me, I will answer. Good-bye.

BIBLE MYTHS;

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiqnity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

Poetry.

A New Creed.

A group of theologians met
To modernize their creed,
Which held that black is white, and yet
Had satisfied their need.

Their great-grandfathers learned it on
Their great-grandmothers' knees,
About predestination and Electoral decrees.

In language more ambiguous
Than Latin upside down,
It taught that some are born to sin,
And some to wear the crown.

These learned theologians fought,
Disputed, argued long;
And each one held that he was right,
And all the rest were wrong.

They all admitted that the creed
Was somewhat out of date,
But still they were not all agreed
Just what to renovate.

But when their work was finished quite,
Their creed did nothing lack;
For where it once read "black is white,"
It now reads "white is black."

Senator Blair's Sunday Rest Bill.

In the United States Senate, December 9, 1889, Mr. Blair introduced the following bill, which was read twice and referred to the committee on education and labor, of which Mr. Blair is chairman:

A bill to secure to the people the privilege of rest and of religious worship, free from disturbance by others, on the first day of the week.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representativs of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no person or corporation, or agent, servant, or employee of any person or corporation, or in the service of the United States in time of peace, except in the necessary enforcement of the laws, shall perform, or authorize to be performed, any secular work, labor, or business to the disturbance of others, works of necessity and mercy and humanity excepted; nor shall any person engage in any play, game, or amusement or recreation to the disturbance of others on the first day of the week, commonly known as Sunday, or during any part thereof, in any territory, district, vessel, or place subject to the exclusiv jurisdiction of the United States; nor shall it be lawful for any person or corporation to receive pay for labor or service performed or rendered in violation of this section.

Sec. 2. That no mails or mail matter shall hereafter be transported in time of peace over any land postal route, nor shall any mail matter be collected, assorted, handled, or delivered during any part of the first day of the week; provided, that whenever any letter shall relate to a work of necessity or mercy, or shall concern the health, life, or decease of any person, and the fact shall be plainly stated upon the face of the envelope containing the same, the postmaster-general shall provide for the transportation of such letter or letters in packages separate from other mail matter, and shall make regulations for the delivery thereof, the same having been received at the place of destination before the said first day of the week, during such limited portion of the day as shall best suit the public convenience and least interfere with the due observance of the day as one of worship and rest; and provided further, that when there shall hav been an interruption in the due and regular transmission of the mails, it shall be lawful to so far examin the same when delivered as to ascertain if there be such matter therein for lawful delivery on the first day of the week.

Sec. 3. That the prosecution of commerce between the states, and with the Indian tribes, the same not being work of necessity, mercy, or humanity, by the transportation of persons or property by land or water in such a way as to interfere with or disturb the people in the enjoyment of the first day of the week, or any portion thereof, as a day of rest from labor, the same not being labor of necessity, mercy, or humanity, or its observance as a day of religious worship, is hereby prohibited, and any person or corporation, or the agent, servant, or employee of any person or corporation, who shall willfully violate this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than ten nor more than one thousand dollars, and no service performed in the prosecution of such prohibited commerce shall be lawful, nor shall any compensation be recoverable or be paid for the same.

Sec. 4. That all military and naval drills, musters, and parades, not in the time of activ service or immediate preparation therefor, of soldiers, sailors, marines, or cadets of the United States on the first day of the week, except assemblies for the due and orderly observance of religious worship, are hereby prohibited, nor shall any unnecessary labor be performed or permitted in the military or naval service of the United States on the first day of the week.

Sec. 5. That it shall be unlawful to pay or to receive payment or wages in any manner for service rendered or for labor performed or for the transportation of persons or of property in violation of the provisions of this act, nor shall any action lie for the recovery thereof, and when so paid, whether in advance or otherwise, the same may be recovered back by whoever shall first sue for the same.

Sec. 6. That labor or service performed and rendered on the first day of the week, in consequence of accident, disaster, or unavoidable delay in making the regular connections upon postal routes and routes of travel and transportation, the preservation of perishable and exposed property, and the regular and necessary transportation and delivery of articles of food in condition for healthy use, and such transportation for short distance from one state, district, or territory into any other state, district, or territory as by local laws shall be declared to be necessary for the public good, shall not be deemed violations of this act, nor shall the provisions of this act be construed to prohibit or to sanction labor on Sunday, by individuals who conscientiously believe in and observe any other day than Sunday as the Sabbath or a day of religious worship, provided such labor be not done to the disturbance of others.

Describing a State of Things in Concordia, Kan.

From the Cloud County Blade.

The prohibition peelers so noted for their zeal, last week got out their scalping-knives and whetted up the steel. They said that prohibition should once more raise a dust, and show the Blade and all its crew, the prohi's deep disgust. They jumped on poor old Benny because that he was down, and said they'd jail the poor old man and do the thing up brown. They sent the sheriff after him at breaking of the day. He went to get his overcoat ——and now he's far away. [Groans mingled with tears.] They searched the caravansery in every hole and nook, but in the cistern and the coal, they never thought to look. They placed a guard around the house, they watched both night and day, but the fog closed in around them——and Benny went away. [Slow music in minor key.] The "boys are getting thirsty, the town is getting dry, the pigs are all a-squealing in the prohibition sty, and imprecations loud and deep are heard on every hand, from parching prohibition throats, against the smelling band. A cry of dreadful anguish is raised by night and day, from those who cannot get their budge since Benny went away. [Groans, sighs, and salt water.]

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. News of the Week.

IF Portugal revolts, inspired by Brazil, Spain may follow, and like disturbances may succeed in Germany and throughout Europe.

THE neighborhood of Reading, Pa., is overrun with an army of burglars, who are supposed to hav their lair in the Welsh mountains.

GLADSTONE'S eightieth birthday was celebrated on the 30th ult.

BY a cave-in at Angel's Camp, Calaveras county, Cal., on the 22d ult., six teen men were irrecoverably buried alive.

HENRY GRADY, the orator and editor, and rising young favorit of the Southern people, died on the 23d ult. at Atlanta.

AT Plains, Pa., on the 27th ult., land over a mine sunk several feet, wrecking a church, a parsonage, and severa houses.

IN conflicts between London strikers and police, serious injuries hav been inflicted, and many offenders hav been sentenced to imprisonment.

IN an Italian Catholic church at Jersey City, N. J., at the close of mass on the 25th ult., two men engaged in a fight in which one was cut, perhaps fatally, with a razor.

"LOOKING BACKWARD" has fallen flat in England. In New England, however, its popularity increases, and one mercantil house givs copies with its sales.

RUFFIANLY political factions are distracting Oklahoma.

THE pope has received a bequest of £680,000 from Baron Lilienthal.

ON Christmas and the day following a great windstorm did much damage in the East.

AN attempt to break jail at Kingston, Ont., on the 24th ult. resulted in the escape of five convicts.

CULVER, the juryman that prevented the Cronin jury convicting more of the accused, and giving those convicted severer punishment, is the object of execration.

SHOOTING affrays over race hav occurred at Jessup, Ga.; Barnesville, Ga.; Augusta, Ga.; Clarksville, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; Shelby, Miss.; Pott's Camp, Miss., and Charleston, S. C. At the former place the whole neighborhood is in arms and troops hav been dispatched. Later dispatches state that at Columbia, S. C., on the 27th a mob of white men took from the jail eight suspected negro murderers and shot them.

IT is said that our deferring to recognize the new government in Brazil will encourage the monarchists to attempt an armed struggle. Count D'Eu, Dom Pedro's son-in-law, is in Europe trying to raise aid in reërecting the empire. The provisional government explains that it cut off the larger grant of money to Dom Pedro because he and his adherents changed from a policy of acquiescence to one of contest. It also defends itself against charges of design in delaying elections, and of aspirations toward usurpation in general. The wife of the ex-emperor died at Oporto, Portugal, on the 28th ult.

SAMSON'S GREAT JAWBONE FEAT.

And Samson said, With the jawbone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, with the jaw of an ass hav I slain a thousand men.—Judges xv, 16.

Gems of Thought.

PEACE is the virtue of civilization; war is its crime.—Victor Hugo.

As the barbarism of the present old governments expires, the moral condition of nations, with respect to each other, will be changed. Man will not be brought up with the savage idea of considering his species as enemies, because the accident of birth gave the individuals existence in countries distinguished by different names.—Paine.

ITS chief ideas [i.e., the chief ideas of Buckle's "History of Civilization"] are: . . . 7. That human progress has been due, not to moral agencies, which are stationary, and which balance one another in such a manner that their influence is unfelt over any long period, but to intellectual activity, which has been constantly varying and advancing: "The actions of individuals are greatly affected by their moral feelings and passions; but these being antagonistic, to the passions and feelings of other individuals, are balanced by them, so that their effect is, in the great average of human affairs, nowhere to be seen, and the total actions of mankind, considered as a whole, are left to be regulated by the total knowledge of which mankind is possessed."—Encyclopedia Britannica.

THE people perish for the lack of knowledge. Nothing but education—scientific education—can benefit mankind. We must find out the laws of nature and conform to them.—Ingersoll.

I PLEAD that humanity has been a real gainer from skepticism, and that the gradual and growing rejection of Christianity—like the rejection of the faiths which preceded it—has, in fact, added, and will add, to man's happiness and well-being. I maintain that, in physics, science is the outcome of skepticism, and that general progress is impossible without skepticism on matters of religion. I mean by religion every form of belief which accepts or asserts the supernatural.—Bradlaugh.

SPAIN has progressed in the arts and sciences, in all that tends to enrich and ennoble a nation, in the precise proportion that she has lost faith in the Catholic church. This may be said of every other nation in Christendom. Torquemada is dead; Castelar is alive. The dungeons of the Inquisition are empty, and a little light has penetrated the clouds and mists—not much, but a little. Spain is not yet clothed and in her right mind. A few years ago the cholera visited Madrid and other cities. Physicians were mobbed. Processions of saints carried the host through the streets for the purpose of staying the plague. The streets were not cleaned; the sewers were filled. Filth and faith, old partners, reigned supreme. The church, "eminent for its sanctity," stood in the light and cast its shadow on the ignorant and the prostrate. The church, in its "inexhaustible fruitfulness in all good things," allowed its children to perish through ignorance, and used the diseases it had produced as an instrumentality to further enslave its votaries and its victims.—Ingersoll.

IF you consult our doctors they will not fail to display the antiquity of their doctrin, which has always upheld itself in spite of the continual attacks of heretics, wicked men, and Infidels, and in spite of pagan persecution. You hav too good an understanding not to perceive that the antiquity of an opinion proves nothing in its favor. If antiquity were a proof of truth, Christianity would be forced to giv way to Judaism, which for the same reason must yield to the religion of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, that is to say, to idolatry which was long anterior to Moses. It was believed for thousands of years that the sun turned round the earth, which remained stationary; and yet it is not the less true that the sun is fixed, and that the earth turns round the sun.—D'Holbach.

THE Mohammedan proves the divine mission of his apostle by appealing to the marvelous propagation of the faith. If the argument is good in the mouth of a Catholic, is it not good in the mouth of a Moslem?—Ingersoll.

THEOLOGY has never served to any purpose, but the distracting of men, and sometimes of whole states.—Voltaire.

ORTHODOX ministers do not add to the sum of knowledge. They produce nothing.—Ingersoll.

A PREDISPOSITION toward the miraculous is the characteristic of all semi-civilized nations.—Lecky.

THE fathers of the church were utterly incapable of examining a question of fact. They were all believers in the miraculous. The same is true of the apostles. If St. John was the author of the Apocalypse, he was undoubtedly insane. If Polycarp said the things attributed to him by Catholic writers, he was certainly in the condition of his master. . . . All the fathers were infinitly credulous. Every one of them believed, not only in the miracles said to hav been wrought by Christ, by the apostles, and by other Christian but every one of them believed in the pagan m acles.—Ingersoll.

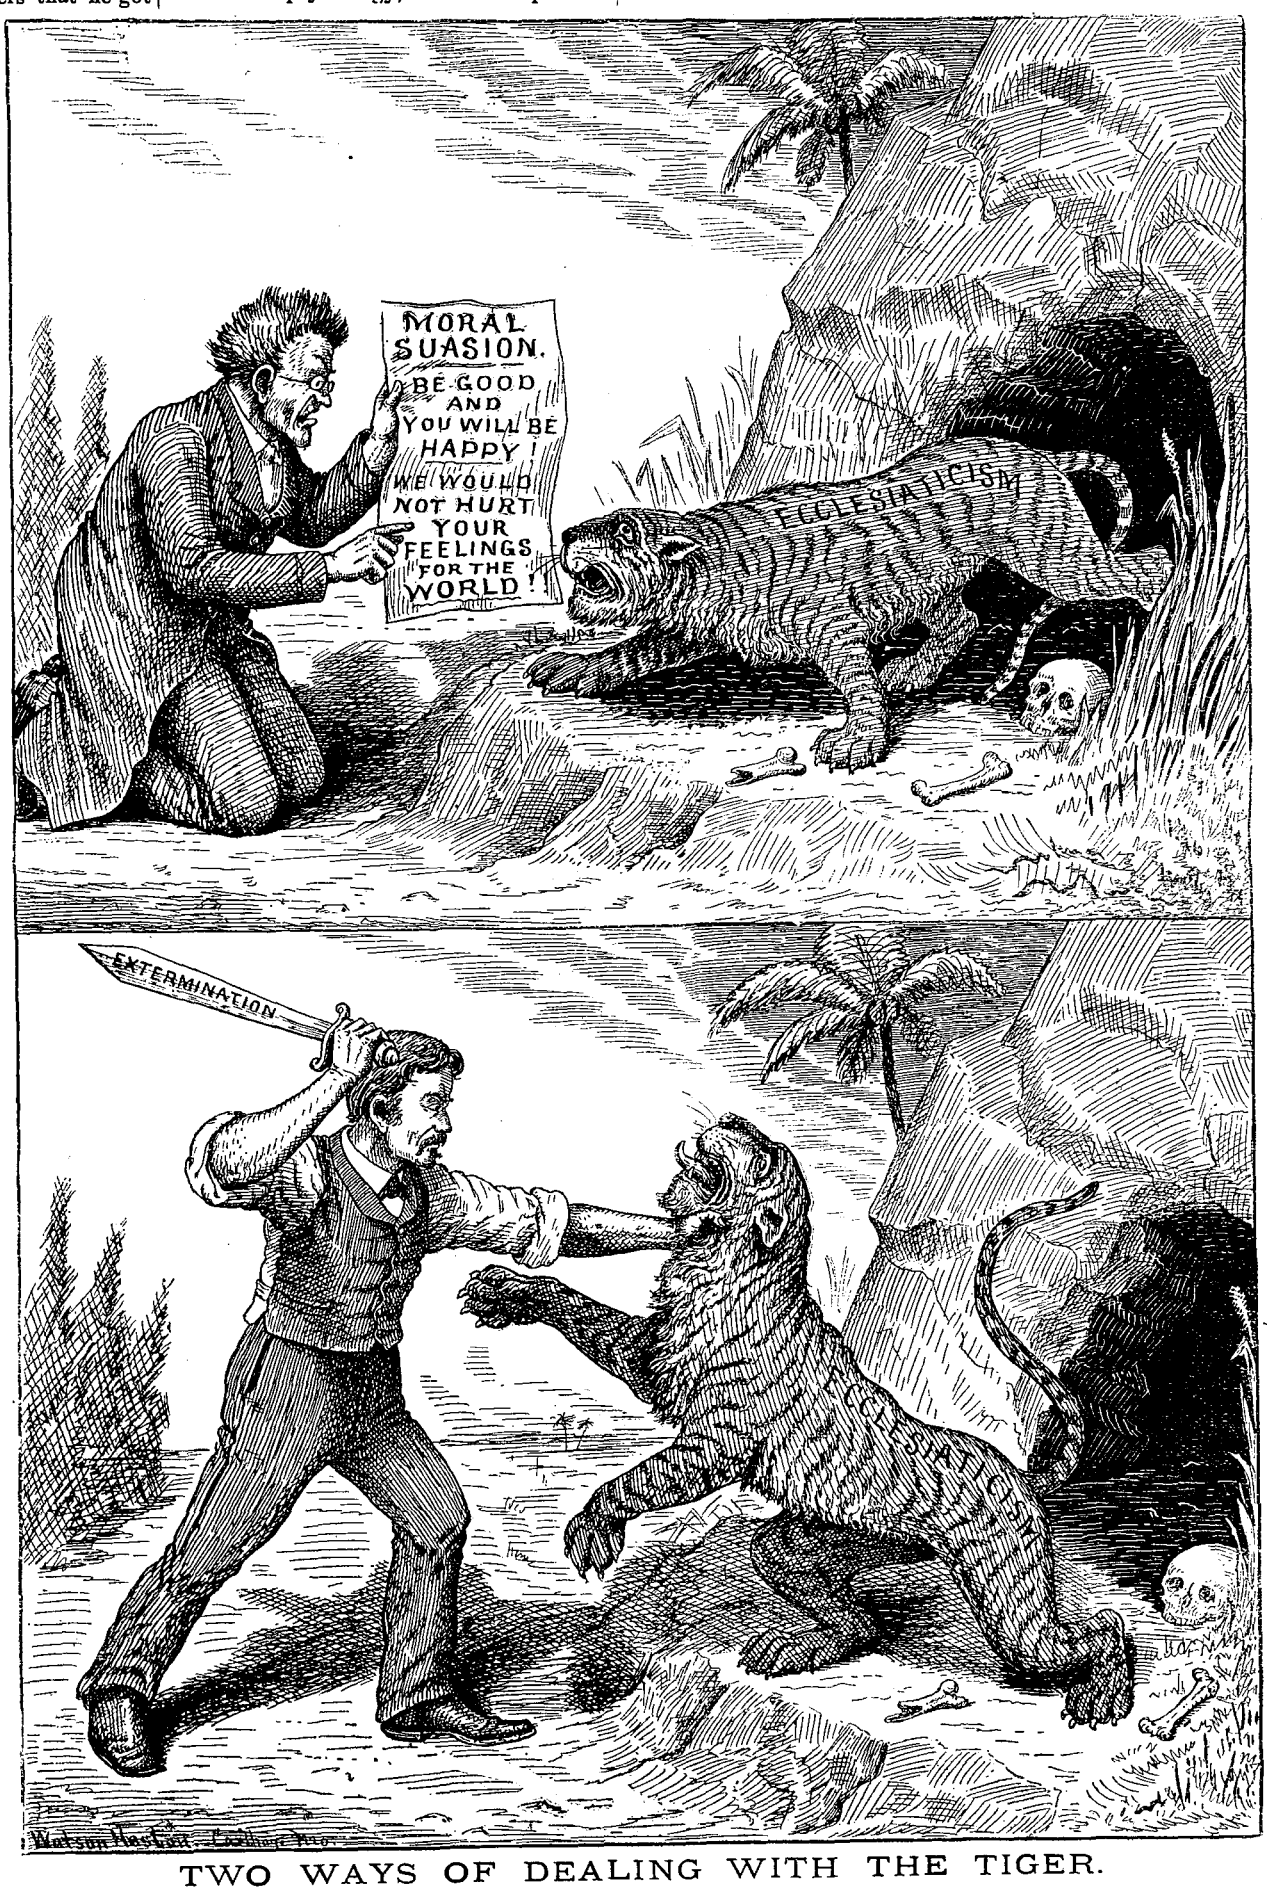
Notes and Clippings.



A SAD case of wickedness is reported from Alabama. A Methodist minister arrested for passing counterfeit money avers that he got it out of the contribution box. If his tale is true, there are some particularly miserable sinners in his congregation. He says that seven out of eight silver dollars in the box were counterfeit. Evidently a contribution box working on the nickel-in-the-slot principle and rejecting spurious coin will hav to be adopted in this unfortunate minister's church.

RELIGIOUS jealousy in India between Hindoos and Mohammedans is said to be fit to involve the entire country in war the moment the British authority should be withdrawn. Lately a Mussulman procession to celebrate a convert was attacked with great fury, and some fatalities were the result.

WRITING on the late revival among Richmond negroes, a correspondent of a New York paper says: "The average Southerner will tell the investigator that he can not discern any improvement in the moral nature of the negro who has gone through this process of conversion, except that the act of dancing is regarded as sure to result in eternal damnation. A Richmond sergeant of police standing on the corner at midnight when the vast black throng was moving by during one of these periods of conversion, expressed a prevalent idea in a curious way when he said, 'The very roosters on this street know when a nigger is getting converted, and they don't dare to crow as long as the church is open.' But in the cities there is, among the better informed of the black race, a small and growing class whose morality is on the increase, and who are slowly drifting away from the superstitions of their race."

REPLYING to a correspondent who asks information on the condition of the working classes in the fourteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Sun says, among other things: "There were, early in the fourteenth century, no roads and no wheeled vehicles; the peasants, who either paid a money rent for their lands and were 'free' or did service for them and were 'villeins,' lived in stone huts without windows or chimneys. There was little salt, no sugar; honey was the only sweetener. The food was almost entirely meat; the people, from the king down, seldom changed their clothes, and skin diseases were terribly prevalent. There was almost no money; what there was the Jews held at cent per cent interest and more. In 1285, in a single small village in Norfolk, there were twelve murders, sixteen burglaries, five fatal fights, five suicides; and in 1284 there had been twelve executions. The life was much harder than we can imagin." It should be recollected that the time described was the time of Christianity's greatest influence.

A CHRISTIAN paper makes complaint against "a system of public education, inaugurated in a large city, where, in the higher grade of instruction, the pupils were taught at the public expense to dissect cats, to accept in toto Bain's psychology, and to despise the Christian religion." The paper inquires: "Whither are we drifting? Is an Agnostic mode of thinking to invade our schools and preoccupy the youthful mind against the only religion which has a right to liv? The friends of Christ should look into these matters."

TWO WAYS OF DEALING WITH THE TIGER.

THE French government will enforce the legal penalty against three hundred priests convicted of violation of the law prohibiting clergy from meddling with elections.

THE list of English publications the prohibition of whose sales has been decreed by the imperial censorship in Russia has just been printed in London. It includes Ingersoll's "Social Salvation" and his "Household of Faith."

A BRIGHT and interesting six-year-old girl in Boston has been the cause of a philological discussion somewhat wider than most six-year-olds generally arouse. She persists in using the terms one-th, two-th, and three-th, instead of first, second, and third, and when her elders try to convince her of her error she shuts them up with the retort that it is just as proper to say one-th as to say fourth, fifth, or sixth. Boston folk want to know if the child is not more right than wrong. They think our language is not properly clear, and that absurdities are tolerated from a conservativ notion that it would be harmful to eradicate them.

SINCE 1800 the population of Europe has just doubled itself. Then the population was 175,000,000; in 1830, 216,000,000; in 1860, 289,000,000; in 1880, 331,000,000; in 1888, 350,000,000.

BILL NYE, the humorist, thus describes his early experience as a school-teacher: "It is a tough experience for a boy of eighteen or nineteen to enter the school-room for the first time and read a chapter from the Bible, as I was expected to do. I had not been accustomed to read every morning aloud from the scriptures, and so I was embarrassed. Besides, I did not use good taste in the selection. I did not know it until it was too late. I thought that the Old Testament would be more interesting to the children than the New, and so struck some matters of history there, told in terse, rugged, realistic language, which attracted more attention from the school than I had expected. I thought it would get better as I moved on, but it did not, and so I tried another selection. Several large girls giggled, and ceased to agitate their gum, as I struck into the second selection. It was hardly the thing for a school reading, and so I omitted the most of it."

AN Englishman has bought the contents of the royal castle of Nuremberg, containing the most complete collection of instruments of torture extant, costing $6,000 in all. There is a library of 3,000 volumes, giving the history of crime and torture for many centuries.

IN Macedonia, where everyone is either a fanatical Christian or a fanatical Mohammedan, brigandage is now rife, and no fewer than two hundred persons hav been murdered and robbed within a few weeks. Two brigands named Shakir and Osman, each of whom has committed more than twenty murders, are terrorizing the country.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

CHAPTER XIII.

OTHER TESTIMONY AND OPINIONS.

New York World—Boston Globe—Manford's Magazine—Chambers's Encyclopedia—Encyclopedia Britannica—World's Sages—Every-Day Life of Lincoln—Cyrus O. Poole—A Citizen of Springfield—Henry Walker—R. C. Adams—Edward Eggleston—Rev. Robert Collyer—Rev. J. Lloyd Jones—Rev. J. W. Chadwick.

The matter selected for this chapter is of a miscellaneous nature, consisting of the statements of those who, for the most part, are not known to hav been personally acquainted with Lincoln. It embraces the opinions of journalists, encyclopedists, biographers, and others. If their words cannot be accepted as the testimony of competent witnesses, they may at least be regarded as the verdict of honest jurors.

New York World.

In the New York World, fifteen years ago, appeared the following:

While it may fairly be said that Mr. Lincoln entertained many Christian sentiments, it cannot be said that he was himself a Christian in faith or practice. He was no disciple of Jesus of Nazareth. He did not believe in his divinity and was not a member of his church.

He was at first a writing Infidel of the school of Paine and Volney, and afterward a talking Infidel of the school of Parker and Channing.

Alluding to the friendly attitude he assumed toward the church and Christianity during the war, this article concludes:

If the churches had grown cold—if the Christians had taken a stand aloof—that instant the Union would hav perished. Mr. Lincoln regulated his religious manifestations accordingly. He declared frequently that he would do anything to save the Union, and among the many things he did was the partial concealment of his individual religious opinions. Is this a blot upon his fame? Or shall we all agree that it was a conscientious and patriotic sacrifice?

Boston Globe.

As an evidence of Lincoln's piety, we are often referred to a picture to be seen in nearly every Northern home, where Lincoln, with his son Tad, is supposed to be represented as reverentially poring over the pages of the Bible. The picture is well calculated to deceive. Its history, however, has often been explained, and its apparently religious character shown to be quite secular. The Boston Globe, in a recent issue, says:

The pretty little story about the picture of President Lincoln and his son Tad reading the Bible is now corrected for the one hundredth time. The Bible was Photographer Brady's picture album, which the president was examining with his son while some ladies stood by. The artist begged the president to remain quiet and the picture was taken. The truth is better than fiction, even if its recital conflicts with a pleasing theory.

Manford's Magazine.

There is one Christian publication that has had the fairness to admit the truth respecting Lincoln's belief. Manford's Magazine, a religious periodical published in Chicago, in its number for January, 1869, contained the following:

That Mr. Lincoln was a believer in the Christian religion, as understood by the so-called orthodox sects of the day, I am compelled most emphatically to deny: that is, if I can put faith in the statements of his most intimate friends in this city [Springfield]. All of them with whom I hav conversed on this subject, agree in indorsing the statements of Mr. Herndon. Indeed, many of them unreservedly call him an Infidel.

The evidence on this subject is sufficient, the writer says, to place "the name of Lincoln by the side of Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, and [Ethan] Allen, of Revolutionary notoriety, as Rationalists; besides being in company with D'Alembert, the great mathematician, Diderot, the geometrician, poet, and metaphysician; also with Voltaire, Hume, Gibbon, and Darwin."

Referring to the Infidel book, written by Lincoln, the writer says:

This work was subsequently thrown in Mr. Lincoln's face while he was stumping this district for Congress against the celebrated Methodist preacher, Rev. Peter Cartwright. But Mr. Lincoln never publicly or privately denied its authorship, or the sentiments expressed therein. Nor was he known to change his religious views any, to the latest period of his life.

The article concludes with these truthful words:

Mr. Lincoln was too good a man to be a Pharisee; too great a man to be a sectarian; and too charitable a man to be a bigot.

Chambers's Encyclopedia.

Alden's American edition of "Chambers's Encyclopedia," one of the most popular as well as one of the most reliable of encyclopedias, says:

He [Lincoln] was never a member of a church; he is believed to hav had philosophical doubts of the divinity of Christ, and of the inspiration of the scriptures, as these are commonly stated in the system of doctrins called evangelical. In early life he read Volney and Paine, and wrote an essay in which he agreed with their conclusions. Of modern thinkers he was thought to agree nearest with Theodore Parker (Art. Lincoln, Abraham).

Encyclopedia Britannica.

By whom the article on Lincoln in "Chambers's Encyclopedia" was written, whether by one of Lincoln's personal friends, or by a stranger, I know not. The article in the "Britannica" was written by his private secretary, Colonel Nicolay. In this article his religion is briefly summed up in the following words:

His [Lincoln's] nature was deeply religious, but he belonged to no denomination: he had faith in the eternal justice and boundless mercy of Providence; and made the golden rule of Christ his practical creed (Am. Ed., vol. xiv, p. 669).

This statement at first glance presents a Christian appearance, and the reader is liable to infer that the writer aims to state that Lincoln was a Christian. But he does not. He aims to state in the least offensiv manner possible that he was not—that he was simply a Deist. A person may hav a "deeply religious" nature, and not be a Christian. He may hav "faith in the eternal justice and boundless mercy of providence," and yet hav no faith whatever in Christianity. He may make "the golden rule of Christ [or Confucius] his practical creed," and at the same time wholly reject the dogma of Christ's divinity. The above statement is substantially true as applied to Lincoln, and it would be equally true if applied to that prince of Infidels, Thomas Paine. His nature was deeply religious; he had faith in the justice and mercy of providence; and he, too, made the Golden Rule his practical creed.

The World's Sages.

In "The World's Sages," Mr. Bennett writes as follows concerning Lincoln's belief:

Upon the subject of religious belief there is some diversity of claims. All his friends and acquaintances readily admit that in early manhood and middle age he was an unbeliever, or a Deist. In fact, he wrote a book or pamphlet vindicating this view. His most intimate friends that knew him best, claim that his opinions underwent no change in this respect; while a certain number of Christians hav, since his death, undertaken to make out that he had become a convert to Christianity (World's Sages, p. 773).

When the contradictory character of the evidence is taken into consideration, together with the fact that his nearest and most intimate friends would be most likely the ones to know of Mr. Lincoln's change, had any such taken place, the uncredibility of the asserted change is easily appreciated (Ibid., p. 774).

Abraham Lincoln was eminently an honest and good man, and these excellent qualities in his character certainly did not proceed from any faith or confidence in Christian or pagan dogmas. He was one of nature's true noblemen, whose good acts and whose commendable conduct did not arise from any supposed fealty to antiquated errors and superstitions (Ib., p. 775).

The Every-Day Life of Lincoln.

In the Emancipation Proclamation appears the following paragraph, which contains the only allusion to deity to be found in this immortal document:

And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of almighty God.

The appearance of the above paragraph in the Proclamation is thus accounted for in "The Every-Day Life of Lincoln," and agrees with Judge Usher's account of it:

It is stated that Mr. Lincoln gave the most earnest study to the composition of the Emancipation Proclamation. He realized, as he afterward said, that the proclamation was the central act of his administration, and the great event of the Nineteenth Century. When the document was completed, a printed copy of it was placed in the hands of each member of the Cabinet, and criticisms and suggestions were invited. Mr. Chase remarked: "This paper is of the utmost importance, greater than any state paper ever made by this Government. A paper of so much importance, and involving the liberties of so many people, ought, I think, to make some reference to Deity. I do not observe anything of the kind in it" (Every-Day Life of Lincoln, pp. 549, 550).

The amendment suggested was allowed by the president, and Mr. Chase requested to supply the words he desired to be inserted. The paragraph quoted was accordingly prepared by him and included in the proclamation. This fact is also admitted by Holland in his "Life of Lincoln" (p. 401).

Cyrus O. Poole.

I quote next from a monograph on "The Religious Convictions of Abraham Lincoln," written by Cyrus O. Poole. Referring to Arnold's and Holland's biographies of Lincoln, Mr. Poole says:

Most sectarians now think, write, and act as if they had a copyright to apply "Christian" to every thing good and God-like about this President; yet no one presumed to call him a Christian until after his death.

It may be a soul-saving process like the ancient one of Pope Gregory in the sixth century. It is related that one day he was meditating on an anecdote of the Pagan Emperor Tragan's having turned back, when at the head of his legions on his way to battle, to render justice to a poor widow who flung herself at his horse's feet. It seemed to Gregory that the soul of a prince so good could not be forever lost, Pagan though he was; and he prayed for him, till a voice declared Tragan to hav been saved through his intercession. And thus, through the prayer of a Christian Pope, a Pagan of the first, was materialized into a Christian in the sixth century, and was, of course, transferred from hell to heaven. Now behold how a modern politician [Arnold] can play theologian in Christianizing Abraham Lincoln.

There is now hope for Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, and Thomas Jefferson, as well as the chieftains, Red Jacket, Tecumseh, and Black Hawk.

Respecting Lincoln's message to his dying father, Mr. Poole, himself a firm believer in the doctrin of immortality, says:

This prophetic affirmation of a continued existence, is the only written evidence of his views on this momentous question that can be found.

In addition to the above, I cull from the same work the following brief extracts:

He lived in a remarkably formativ and progressiv period, and was in all matters fully abreast with his time. As a truthful thinker, he greatly excelled any of the statesmen of his day.

Lincoln, like Socrates, was a man so natural, so thoughtful, rational, and sagacious, that he clearly saw that the popular traditional theology of his day and age was not religion.

The truth is, this great champion of freedom was much more original and Pagan, than conventional and Christian. Love of goodness in every thing makes Socrates the central figure of the classic ages. Mr. Lincoln's love of, and loyalty to, truth, to liberty and goodness, render his name equally illustrious in modern times.

A Citizen of Springfield.

A gentleman residing in Springfield, Ill., who was intimately acquainted with Lincoln from the time he located in that city up to the time he removed to Washington, a period of nearly twenty-five years, in a letter dated Aug. 20, 1887, writes as follows:

I will say in regard to Mr. Lincoln's religious views that he was not orthodox in his belief, unless he changed after he left Springfield. He was heterodox—did not believe in the divinity of Christ—in short was a freethinker. Now I do not want to be brought into public notice in this matter.

In deference to this writer's request his name is omitted, and this omission destroys, to a great extent, the value of his testimony. It is inserted not because it adds any particular weight to the evidence already adduced, but as a specimen of a very large amount of evidence of the same character that must be withheld simply because the persons writing or interviewed shrink from publicity. A chapter, yes, a volume, of this anonymous testimony might be given. At least a hundred personal friends of Lincoln, living in and about Springfield, privately and confidentially assert that he was an Infidel, but will not permit their names to be used. Twenty years ago a majority of them would not hav objected to their statements being published; but the relentless war waged by the church against those who hav publicly certified to the facts, has sealed their lips.

Henry Walker.

I now present to the reader another citizen of Springfield, one who is not afraid to publicly express an honest opinion. Mr. Henry Walker, who has resided in that city for many years, writes as follows concerning Lincoln's religious belief:

After inquiring of those who were intimate and familiar with him, I arrived at the conclusion that he was a Deist,—certainly not a Christian, unless he became one during his residence at the White House.

There is a rumor current here that he once wrote an anti-Christian pamphlet, but his friends persuaded him not to publish it.

Mr. Walker was not personally acquainted with Lincoln. His conclusion is simply based upon the information obtained from those who were acquainted with him. His statement, like the preceding one, is introduced not so much because of any especial value attaching to it as mere testimony, but because it fairly represents the common sentiment of those who hav investigated this subject, and particularly those who are on familiar terms with Lincoln's old associates in Illinois. The knowledge of our anonymous witness was shared by Dr. Smith and Mr. Arnold, and is shared by Mr. Edwards; the opinion expressed by Mr. Walker was the opinion privately entertained by Dr. Holland, it is the opinion privately entertained by Mr. Bateman, yes, and unquestionably the opinion privately entertained by Mr. Reed himself.

Allen Thorndike Rice.

The lamented Allen Thorndike Rice, whose brilliant editorial management of the North American Review has placed this periodical in the front rank of American magazines, in his Introduction to the "Reminiscences of Lincoln," says:

The Western settlers had no respect for English traditions, whether of Church or of State. Accustomed all their lives to grapple with nature face to face, they thought and they spoke, with all the boldness of unrestrained sincerity, on every topic of human interest or of sacred memory, without the slightest recognition of any right of external authority to impose restrictions, or even to be heard in protest against their intellectual independence. As their life developed the utmost independence of creed and individuality, he whose originality was the most fearless and self-contained was chief among them. Among such a people, blood of their blood and bone of their bone, differing from them only in stature, Abraham Lincoln arose to rule the American people with a more than kingly power, and received from them a more than feudal loyalty.

So eager is the church for proofs of Lincoln's piety that the most incredible anonymous story in support of this claim is readily accepted and published by the religious press as authentic history. By this means the masses hav gradually come to regard Lincoln as a devout Christian. It is evident that Mr. Rice had these fabulous tales in mind when he wrote the following:

Story after story and trait after trait, as varying in value as in authenticity, has been added to the Lincolnia, until at last the name of the great war President has come to be a biographic lodestone, attracting without distinction or discrimination both the true and the false.

Robert C. Adams.

The noted author, Capt. Robert C. Adams, of Montreal, Can., says:

It is significant that in political revolution it is the Freethinker who is usually the leader. Franklin, Paine, Jefferson, Washington, were the chief founders of the American Republic, and Lincoln presided at its second birth. Mazzini and Garibaldi are the heroes of United Italy; Rousseau, Voltaire, and Victor Hugo hav been the chief inspirers of Democratic France (The New Ideal).

Rev. Edward Eggleston.

When Lincoln went to New York in the winter of 1860, to deliver his Cooper Institute address, he had occasion to remain over Sunday in that city. At the suggestion of a friend, he visited the famous Five Points, and attended a Sunday-school where the spawn of New York's worst inhabitants to the number of several hundred were assembled. Importuned for a speech, he made a few remarks to the children, and the fact was published in the papers. The idea of this Infidel politician addressing a Sunday-school was so ludicrous that it caused much merriment among his friends at Springfield. When he returned home one of them, probably Colonel Matheny, called on him to learn what it all meant. The conversation that followed, including Lincoln's explanation of the affair, is thus related by the noted preacher and author, Edward Eggleston:

He started for "Old Abe's" office; but bursting open the door impulsivly, found a stranger in conversation with Mr. Lincoln. He turned to retrace his steps, when Lincoln called out, "Jim! What do you want?" "Nothing." "Yes, you do; come back." After some entreaty Jim approached Mr. Lincoln, and remarked, with a twinkle in his eye, "Well, Abe, I see you hav been making a speech to Sunday-school children. What's the matter?" "Sit down, Jim, and I'll tell you all about it." And with that Lincoln put his feet on the stove, and began: "'When Sunday morning came, I didn't know exactly what to do. Washburne asked me where I was going. I told him I had nowhere to go; and he proposed to take me down to the Five Points Sunday-school, to show me something worth seeing. I was very much interested by what I saw. Presently, Mr. Pease came up and spoke to Mr. Washburne, who introduced me. Mr. Pease wanted us to speak. Washburne spoke, and then I was urged to speak. I told them I did not know anything about talking to Sunday-schools, but Mr. Pease said many of the children were friendless and homeless, and that a few words would do them good. Washburne said I must talk. And so I rose to speak; but I tell you, Jim, I didn't know what to say. I remembered that Mr. Pease said that they were homeless and friendless, and I thought of the time when I had been pinched by terrible poverty. And so I told them that I had been poor; that I remembered when my toes stuck out through my broken shoes in winter; when my arms were out at the elbows; when I shivered with the cold. And I told them there was only one rule. That was, always do the very best you can. I told them that I had always tried to do the very best I could; and that, if they would follow that rule, they would get along somehow. That was about what I said" (Every-Day Life of Lincoln, pp. 322, 323).

The foregoing is significant. Lincoln was not an advocate of Sunday-schools. He had probably never visited one before. As generally conducted, he regarded them as simply nurseries of superstition. He could not indorse the religious ideas taught in them, and he was not there that day to antagonize them. As a consequence, this ready talker—this man who had been making speeches all his life—was, for the first time, at a loss to know what to say. He could not talk to them about the Bible—he could not tell them that "it is the best gift which God has given to man"—that "all the good from the savior of the world is communicated to us through this book"—that "but for this book we could not know right from wrong"—he could not tell them how Jesus had died for little children, and all this, because he did not believe it. But he obeyed his own life-long rule, did the best he could under the embarrassing circumstances, and gave them a little wholesome advice entirely free from the usual Sunday-school cant.

Rev. Robert Collyer.

Robert Collyer states that Lincoln, just before he was elected president, visited the office of the Chicago Tribune, and picking up a volume of Theodore Parker's writings, turned to Dr. Ray and remarked: "I think that I stand about where that man stands."

Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones.

The Rev. J. Lloyd Jones, one of Chicago's most eloquent divines, in a sermon preached in All Souls church, Dec. 9, 1888, gave utterance to the following:

Are there not thousands who hav loved virtue who did not accept Jesus Christ in any supernatural or miraculous fashion, who if they knew of him at all knew of him only as the Nazarine peasant—the man Jesus? Such was Abraham Lincoln, the tender prophet of the gospel of good will upon earth; Charles Sumner, the great apostle of human liberty; Gerrit Smith, the St. John of political reform; William Ellery Channing, our sainted preacher; Theodore Parker, the American Luther, hurling his defiance at the devils of bigotry; John Stuart Mill and Harriet Martineau—yes, to take an extreme case, the genial and over-satirical Robert G. Ingersoll, are among those who love goodness and foster nobility, though they hav no clear vision into futurity and confess no other lordship in him of Nazareth save the dignity of aim and tenderness of life.

Rev. John W. Chadwick.

In an address delivered in Tremont Temple, Boston, May 30, 1872, the Rev. John W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, N. Y., referring to the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States, said:

Of the six men who hav done most to make America the wonder and the joy she is to all of us, not one could be the citizen of a government so constituted; for Washington and Franklin and Jefferson, certainly the three mightiest leaders in our early history, were heretics in their day, Deists, as men called them; and Garrison and Lincoln and Sumner, certainly the three mightiest in these later times, would all be disfranchised by the proposed amendment.

. . . . . .

Lincoln could not hav taken the oath of office had such a clause been in the Constitution.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

Heathen or Christian—Which?

Doctor Livingstone, the great African explorer and Christian missionary, informs us that tribes in central Africa "hav such a nice sense of justice that they never encroach on the territory of each other." Also that no man is afraid of being cheated, and that no man is cheated. That no precautions are taken to prevent theft and robbery, and that no theft and robberies are committed. Such is the moral status of a people whom our American Christians are trying to evangelize. How will the moral standing of Christian nations compare with these heathens of Africa? Does history prove that their sense of justice has been so nice that they never encroached on each other's territory? From the third century, when the bloody Constantine emblazoned the cruel emblem of the cross on his battle flags, and nations were converted by the sword, and converts baptized with daggers at their throats, from this horrible epoch in the history of the world up to the present time, Christian nations hav never manifested the least sense of justice toward each other; but banditti-like hav ever plundered and pillaged their weaker neighbors, and not only appropriated their land and property, but in many instances treated them with the most relentless cruelty, according to the examples and commands of their Bible, and by the authority of "Thus sayeth the Lord of hosts." Bloody, heartless, and cruel conquest has been the means which Christian nations hav adopted to obtain their neighbors' lands and property, and they adhere strictly to the principle that might makes right. History proves that Christianity has been the dire scourge of the ages, and well did Talmage say: "A red line runs through church history for near nineteen hundred years—a line of blood; not by hundreds of thousands, but by millions, we count the slain." And yet the church with such a record—the curse of mankind, is industriously begging funds to send a set of pestilent, lazy, worthless missionaries to Africa, to pervert and deprave its justice-loving people by the propagation of one of the most loathsome systems of theology ever inflicted on the human race. Then remember these heathen African people never committed theft and robbery, and that, too, in the absence of all law to prevent it. How is it in our own Christian country of churches? Here we hav endless enactments punishing offenders against the right of life and property with fire, imprisonment, and death, yet so strong is the tendency of our people to crime, that with all these fearful penalties, theft, arson, robbery, and murder are rife in our land. What is the matter? I answer, only the legitimate working of the laws of cause and effect. Church theology governs the masses. This is the trouble. Our penitentiary here contains within its walls, exclusiv of those leased out to owners of coal mines, over eight hundred convicts, and ninety-eight hundredths of them are believers in the Christians' Bible, and when they committed the crime for which they are now suffering they no doubt felt consoled that "Jesus paid it all."

O that we could utterly abolish Christianity from the minds of men, and substitute in its stead such African morality as Livingstone describes! But we are ever confronted with the self-evident fact that effects are infallibly true to their producing causes, and from this source we can alone reasonably expect relief. The Africans referred to are simply children of nature, and their minds hav never been warped and depraved by the pernicious teachings of the Bible and church theology. The whole stream of human life in Christendom has been turned out of its natural channel by the influence of church superstition. The Christian's idea of a God as set forth in the Bible, would virtually shame a devil-worshiper. No description of grizzly ghost, fiend, imp, or devil in the record of Scandinavia's hell is half so remorseless, cruel, and revolting as the character of Jehovah as set forth in the Bible. A belief in such a God cannot but hav a brutalizing effect on the human kind. They are not only taught to believe in this God, who is a "God of battles," a "man of war," whose "arrows are drunk with blood," and whose "sword devours flesh," who declares that he would "sprinkle the blood of his creatures on his raiment," and "stain all his vesture red," and who pronounced, "Cursed is he that keepeth back his sword from blood," and commanded his chosen people to butcher babes ("little ones"), and "rip up the mothers;" and who crowned his deific infamy by consigning the truest and noblest of his earthly children to a never-ending hell of torment—I repeat, the Christians are not only taught to believe in this deific monster, but they are given a big send-off in a criminal direction by being made to believe that they themselvs are "children of wrath sold under sin;" condemned culprits guilty of the awful offense of eating an apple nearly six thousand years before they were born, with no power to do good, and with nothing to expect but a "fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation," when the "loving and meek Jesus" "shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the gospel"—the infamous gospel, based upon measures contradictory to fact and every principle of common justice. The effect of this doctrin on man is most lamentable, as the history of Christianity proves. Teach a man he is innately vile, without any power to do right, and he will never try to do right. In the next place, he is promised a release from his "already condoned" condition, not on his own merit, but through the merit of another. This deadens every impulse for right doing. He fully believes that his vices and crimes actually render him an object of deep solicitude with his heavenly father, while the ninety-nine other fellows who hav ever walked upright and practiced virtue, are scarcely objects of notice at the heavenly court, where the angels frantically shout themselvs hoarse over some old reprobate who made a halt in his depraved career simply because he was afraid of being scorched by hell-fire. Then it further encourages and consoles these old eleventh-hour converts to learn from the "blessed word of God" that Noah, Lot, Judah, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, Solomon, and a score of other malefactors, perpetrated falsehood, theft, robbery, adultery, rape, incest, and murder, without in the least degree forfeiting the favor of the Bible God, or disqualifying themselvs to be men after his own heart.

Now it is evident that an acceptance of these doctrins as true, is virtually licensing evil-disposed persons to commit crime. Many well-disposed people with good moral hereditary antecedents, find enough of heathen morality in the Bible to encourage them in walking uprightly, and are not particularly damaged by the doctrins above referred to. They are in the church because it is respectable in the eyes of the world, and because their ancestors were Christians, and on account of the social advantages it affords. They read in the Bible that "God is love," but never realize that when he is represented as kind and merciful once, he is represented as a vengeance-gorged monster a hundred times. The bent of their natures being good, they would act uprightly in the church or out of it, Bible or no Bible. But it is the great mass of evil-doers, men and women who are under the influence of their appetites and passions, and whose inherited impulses are bad, it is this class that the total-depravity and Jesus-paid-it-all doctrins license to do evil. It includes all our prison convicts, in fact or in prospect. These Christian theories are pernicious in their influence on all men and women who believe them, and hav not intellectual and moral brain sufficient to properly direct and safely guard the indulgence of their appetites and passions. And from this class all our vast army of criminals is recruited. The man or woman who inherits sufficient moral brain to restrain and prevent excessiv indulgence of the animal propensities, is on safe moral ground, in the church or out of it. The only danger with this class is, that a blind belief in religious dogmas may result in fanaticism, against which pure motivs are no safeguard. Freeman, of Pocasset, who murdered his child, à la Jephthah, was no doubt a man of honest convictions, but meditating on the Bible and its horrible teaching so perverted his moral sense that he coolly murdered his innocent little girl under the impression that such an act was highly pleasing to the God of Abraham and Jephthah, whom he worshiped.

While I would counsel a kindly spirit toward the unfortunate victims of the Christian superstition, I would at the same time wage an open, aggressiv war on their degrading superstition. We get no credit for advocating compromise measures. In fact, there is no compromise-ground, not an inch, between Secularism and orthodoxy, or truth and error, and as it would be unwise to sow wheat in a jimpson and dogfennel lot expecting it to germinate and mature a crop, so likewise would it be useless and unwise to try to instil Liberal ideas in a mind perverted and filled with the hideous and loathsome theories of orthodoxy. First let us rid the soil of noxious vegetation by the vigorous use of grubbing-hoe and driving plowshare, and then sow our profitable grain. As a safety measure America must be Secularized, and it will take heroic measures and great sacrifice to do it. Let us be half as loyal to truth and liberty as the church is to error and slavery, and the victory is won. A tractarian system ramified so as to reach every state and county in the Union would hasten the coming day. Men will read a tract in private, when they would not dare be seen at a public lecture on Liberal topics. Hundreds of us hav been working on this line for years, but only an organized force can expect to vanquish a well disciplined and equipped and ever vigilant enemy.

An Open Letter to Mr. Burnham.

DEAR SIR: You and I hav both been ministers and we know how common it is to assume and assert without proof. You say that in the congress of the American Secular Union held in Philadelphia "no deeper disgrace could be heaped on the cause . . . than the contempt shown in the last congress." You further say, "There was a manifest disregard of all that has been done and those that hav done it and the way in which it was done. The services of all men and women who hav borne the heat and burden were ignored entirely, while strangers to our cause, ignorant of the first principles of our cause, and ministers of the Lord Jesus Christ, were invited to do the work of the congress."

Now, the truth of this I flatly deny and call upon you for the proof.

1. Dr. McGlynn and Rev. Mr. Savage took no part in "the work of the congress," though the latter was one of the founders of the National Liberal League in 1876, and the former was an avowed advocate of secular schools before the American Secular Union was born! Was Mr. Wakeman of no account, and was it nothing that Mr. Washburn was only prevented by sickness from speaking? Moreover, there were more than a half dozen speeches made by Lucy Colman, Susan Wixon, Harry Hoover, Mr. Charlesworth, Jay Chaapel, A. C. Cotton, and last, not least, by Messrs. Chamberlain, Kirschner, and Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr.

Was this to "ignore entirely" all good and faithful Liberals?

2. I now call upon Mr. Burnham to point out one single item in the amended constitution of the American Secular Union, inconsistent or at variance with the National Liberal League, or the constitution of the American Secular Union as it stood before the Philadelphia congress. I also call upon him to point out anything that was said or done by the congress in Philadelphia to justify the charges he has made against it. Now, Mr. Burnham, "no beating about the bush"—no quibbling, but come right down to honest work and answer categorically these questions!

R. B. WESTBROOK,
President American Secular Union.

Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 3, 1890.

From Freethought.

Let me say a word to Liberals. Are we Secularists, or hobbyists, which? I consider all this harsh criticism in our ranks regarding others' opinions and their various shades of belief, whatever they may be, as absolutely detrimental to Freethought and Secular work. What belief others entertain is no one's business so long as they fulfill their duties as Secularists by favoring and supporting Secular work. A true Liberal should be employed in better work than flinging sarcasm at those who entertain views different from his. All such clashing creates dissension in our Secular work and retards the progress of the Union. The question is not as to what you believe, but what are you willing to do for Secular work (the welfare of the human race) and the American Secular Union? All who wish to promote these objects and help support the Nine Demands (which is the work of the American Secular Union), count them in, and stop this clashing and brewing dissension in regard to what opinions others entertain. It has no business in our Secular Union, or in our separate Secular work. Let us rise above it; then there will be no such word as fail. President Westbrook has well said: "If the movement for secularizing the state is kept on the narrow basis advocated by some of our friends, it would take ten thousand years." It would be well for many Secularists to memorize the letter of President Westbrook as published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 7th, and constantly bear in mind what the Secular Union is organized for.

San José, Cal. R. H. SCHWARTZ.

The Reason Why.

We are astounded when we think of the thousands who hav been tortured and put to death because they were unable to fashion their minds according to the common mold prescribed by Christians.

We almost hold our breath when we think that the minds of men could be so warped that they really believed that those who differed from them merited death by the most cruel means which could be inflicted.

We are struck dumb when we think that so intelligent a man as Jonathan Edwards was could say that he could rejoice to see his wife and children and dearest friends in hell if God willed it, and held that God would consign all to everlasting punishment who did not believe the same dogma.

But it is all easy when we consider the influences under which the minds of men were shaped.

First, they were taught to believe that one of the most inconsistent bocks ever written was written by the fingers of God.

Second, that God was most pleased when the barbarous practices commanded in that book were carried out.

Third, that an eternity of bliss awaited those who were instrumental in enforcing those commands.

Fourth, that there is nothing of importance attaching to this life, but that our chief concern is to secure that blissful abode "not made with hands, eternal in the heaven," regardless of consequences here.

Every intelligent person must see that when doctrins so terrible in their consequences are thoroughly believed, and become fixed in the mind as eternal truths, the ignorance and brutality of the Dark Ages, and the superstition in New England times, must be the result. That as long as the black cloud of Christianity hangs over the minds of the people, this world must be a "wilderness of woe," as the Christian declares it to be. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Only think of it. This is an unconditional promis. The pains of hell and the joys of heaven are made to hinge upon belief. No matter what is done in this life, this promis (to the Christian) secures a claim to heaven which no power can annul.

When a man believes that this world is of little importance, and that the mistakes, mishaps, and willful designs of men are of no consequence, what kind of a man must he be?

Is it any wonder that our prisons are filled with Christians, and that so many get a send-off to their heavenly home from the hangman's scaffold? Although a man may murder his own family and plunder his neighbors, and be guilty of rape, arson, and treason, although his sins may be like mountains and as black as night, belief and baptism are all that is required to pass him through the celestial gates and make him a fit companion for Talmage, "Holy John," Jesus Christ & Co.

With a firm belief that this life is of little consequence—that the great concern of life is the hereafter—with the fullest assurance that the way is opened for him to be eternally happy, so that there can be no mistake, must not such a man be naturally careless in regard to his acts in this life? There is a being held out to him, and he is told that he can and may shift all the consequences of his crimes upon this being. No matter how long or how deeply he had sinned, the blood of the savior cancels it all if he only believes and is baptized. That there is a way for a man to escape the consequences of his acts, is the most dangerous doctrin ever taught. It is like offering a premium on crime, and all good men should repudiate such teaching.

Those who sincerely believe the Bible hav lost their senses and are beyond the reach of reason. Such men are not only a danger to themselvs, but are a dangerous element in society.

The tendency of a system of religion which teaches that men may do wrong and then shift the responsibility on an innocent party is to produce a class of human sneaks—too mean to be anything but Christians.

Will such teaching ever elevate the race? Is it not a bid on crime and ignorance—a ball and chain on the leg of progress? Will such teaching hav a tendency to lead men up to independent thought and heroic actions?

Every man ought to be taught to conduct himself as if the eye of the whole world was upon him, and as if the welfare of the world hung upon every act. Beware of any system of religion which degrades our common manhood. Every man is degraded when he is led to believe that there is a way for him to escape the consequences of wrong-doing.

"He that believeth not shall be damned." This passage of the New Testament assumes that belief is a matter of choice, a creature of the will. Absurdity elephantidæ!

Ask Professor Holden if he can choose to believe that the earth is flat. Ask Colonel Ingersoll if he can will or choose to believe in the justice of eternal punishment. Ask the mathematician if he can choose to believe that two and two make five.

The folly and outrageous injustice of this passage of the New Testament will be made to appear when it is proposed to send Professor Holden to hell because he cannot believe the earth to be flat; to roast Colonel Ingersoll eternally because he cannot see the justice of punishing one eternally for the sins committed in this short life; to make a mathematician the companion of Old Nick because he cannot believe that the relation of numbers is a farce; to compel the beggar to be an eternal tramp in hell because he cannot believe that his half-dozen pennies are so many doubloons.

I sit quiet and silent, and something seems to swell within me with almost explosiv power because I can find no language to picture the terrible consequences of such teaching. The consequences are known only to the students of history.

Is it any wonder that Christians hav cut out the hearts of helpless women who did not believe, when to them it was certain that God was only waiting to roast them in hell?

"Believe" and be saved. "Doubt" and "be damned." Doubts are dangerous. You can believe if you will. If you go to hell it is your own fault.

O my tender-footed brother Liberals, are you not afraid that somebody will be "shocked" if such consummate folly is held up to ridicule? Is it our duty to handle such holy nonsense gingerly and touch it only with velvet? O ye generation of invertebrates, hasten to get Heston's neck into a bootjack. He may "shock" somebody. JOHN PECK.

Christmas and Other Slush.

Said ex-Governor Long of Massachusetts, in Boston, Sunday evening, December 15th, in eulogizing "The Pilgrim Fathers," "I do not believe in looking upon them as a set of ascetics, ecclesiastical fanatics. . . . They came to found a New England home of freedom to worship God."

Yes; freedom for themselvs and death for all others who could not conform to their narrow bigotry. Hear him again: "They were not persecutors."

Well, if they were not, they soon became such. The Pilgrims landing in Plymouth Dec. 20, 1620, and driving Roger Williams from their colony in Boston only sixteen years afterward for the crime of being a Baptist, looks as if they were not persecutors! Who put Quakers to death and hanged witches in New England? Was it Infidels? Did the Indians persecute and kill the whites, or vice versa? Why will our orators, historians, and preachers thus falsify history? Away with it!

Rev. H. Price Collier, of Brooklyn, N. Y., said on the same evening in Kings Chapel, Boston: "When we want what God wants then prayer is answered." Just so, if we admit God to be fate. We hav only to ascertain what will be, then pray for that, and God will hear and answer every time. "It is just because the law is inexorable," said he, "that we can pray to be adjusted to it. When Jesus prayed, 'Let this cup pass from me,' that was what God himself did not want. Therefore he was crucified and had to adjust himself to the law. If Jesus had only thought of this before he prayed, he would not hav had to pray at all, since God does as he pleases and never changes his laws for one of us," says Mr. Collier. Indeed, he does not, and that shows the foolishness of prayer. Form good resolutions in your own strength, then keep them, and you will be better off than though you howled to all the gods in the universe.

There was enough Christmas slush poured out in the Boston churches alone to hav made truth of a lie if it had been possible. I only asked myself, Can these men believe what they are saying—that a boy was born, as they pretend, eighteen hundred and eighty-nine years ago, in whom, if we believe, we shall be saved from a roasting caldron after we are dead? O cant and hypocrisy! Ye hav much to atone for, or else ignorance, stupid ignorance, is at fault. Can it be that Unitarians are thus ignorant?

Said Rev E. A. Horton: "The founders of the Puritan church were governed mainly by reason, righteousness, and reverence." I should say, in view of their zeal, they were governed by fanaticism, bigotry, and revenge; possibly ignorance lying at the bottom of the whole delusion and error.

Said President Baldwin, of the Christian Union, "What holy and cheerful associations cluster around the Christmas season, which celebrates the birth of Christ!" Well may he say "celebrates," for he must know that no such person or god was born on that day, or ever lived.

Said F. G. Peabody, D.D., in Kings Chapel, "The three great sins which stand against the progress of a higher life, are faithlessness, restlessness, and selfishness." I should say they were dishonesty, intemperance and immoralities of all kinds, with ignorance as the basis.

Rev. Brooke Hereford, of Arlington street church, believes in being "of good cheer," so he tells his hearers, "I don't say that one may not go throught the world without religion and still keep honest and kind, but the simple, sweet religion is such a help," etc. Of course it is; now it has become popular, it will buy off almost any crime; but how was it when Jesus and his twelve had not where to lay their heads?

At Trinity church Rev. Philips Brooks, D.D., spoke of the Christian type of glory as being different from other types of glory; as if you could hav a Christian sunset, or a religious river or mountain! He dilated on "the brutal arrogance of wealth" just as if his church and himself was not a wealthy corporation and he its owner or proprietor! He was sure the millennium would come, some time. Why should we complain of its delay—"we were in such a hurry and God could wait so long?" Yes, God could wait four thousand years before furnishing a dear savior, with millions dropping into a burning hell, and why need man be in such a hurry? Why could not he wait when he was the fellow to be burnt?

The church of the Immaculate Conception, of the Jesuit fathers; the cathedral of the Holy Cross; the church of the Advent, and all other Roman Catholic societies in Boston, as elsewhere, come in for their share of holy slush with their daughter, the Protestant renegade from the holy mother church. And who shall say, with all their cumbrous rites and ceremonies, that they hav less Bible authority for their disgusting flummeries than the Protestants? Both go to the same Bible, both believe in and pray to the same Jesus-God; both believe in the same hereafter, with slight variations; both equally condemn heretics outside of their respectiv churches; both sing with equal gusto:

> For in the royal David's town,
> David's son is now come down
> To abide;
> In this babe the savior see,
> And the tidings glad shall be > Spread far and wide.

Barre, Mass., Dec. 26, 1889. ELLA E. GIBSON.

The Taxed and the Untaxed.

One of the most able and successful business men and earnest Liberals of Washington, is George M. Boman, of Seattle, member of the central executiv committee for the convention to effect practical organization of the Liberals of Washington, to convene at Seattle, January 28th, 29th, and 30th. Realizing the need of prompt action to defeat the subtle schemes of the combined church organizations, and that delays are dangerous, he has anticipated some of the work of the organization. He commissioned Mr. Heston to design a cartoon to show most forcibly the gross injustice of exempting church property from taxation, under the title of "Taxed and Untaxed." And most ably has Mr. Heston filled the order.

Then compiling "Words of Wisdom," from the most distinguished statesmen and churchmen, he has had five thousand copies printed as leaflets, and I am helping in the good work by distributing them throughout the whole state, Mr. Boman paying all the cost.

Mr. Boman desires that every Liberal in the state of Washington shall be supplied free with a sufficient number of copies to send one to each member of the legislature from their precinct; and to supply copies to all intelligent Christian friends who will so send them.

Each leaflet should hav written on it the name and address of the sender.

Wherever Liberals can induce friends, not avowed Liberals, to judiciously circulate copies of the leaflet among Christians, they can be supplied, postpaid, by writing me the number of leaflets they require. There is no word in the leaflet that can offend Christians, no intimation of its emanating from an Infidel source. Yet it is a wonderful educator, a grand thought-provoker.

Mr. Boman, during the constitutional convention at Olympia, had handsome photograph copies made of the cartoon originally published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the title, "Taxed and Untaxed," and mailed a copy to every member of the convention, and it had a powerful influence in defeating the church organizations in their endeavor to engraft exemption from taxation of all church property in the constitution.

Now, with every member of the legislature deluged with this new "Cartoon Leaflet," signed by voters of their respectiv precincts (a gentle hint that, if they fail to work and vote for right and justice, those voters will fail to work and vote for them next election), and with the more intelligent Christians thus educated on the facts, the victory for right and justice is insured.

If one man can thus accomplish so great and grand a work, what may we not effect when all the Liberals of this young giant state of Washington are effectivly organized? It would hav been impossible to send the leaflets throughout the state only for the initiativ work done by the Walla Walla Liberal Club toward organization. They obtained a list of names and addresses of all the Liberals of the state.

There is great enthusiasm in regard to the convention, and an earnest purpose to effect real, practical organization.

Now is the time for action—"now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." Salvation from the despotism and tyranny of priestcraft, from misrepresentation, denunciation, hate, and ostracism. By the memory of the noble, brave hearts that suffered so much to secure for us the liberty we do enjoy, let us prove worthy of the priceless heritage of freedom. Let us unite in self-sacrificing endeavors to secure freedom for our children and earn the plaudits of the world through all coming time, and, by our zeal and self-sacrifice, insure the eternal elevation of the "flag above the cross."

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Another Christian Forgery.

The latest Christian forgery is a pretended proclamation of President George Washington "given under my (his) hand and seal at the city of New York, the 3d day of October, in the year of our Lord 1789," appointing "Thursday the 26th day of November next" as a day of Thanksgiving. It appeared in the Boston Herald, with the following editorial preface:

> Just one hundred years ago next Thursday was observed our first national Thanksgiving day, its date being Thursday the 26th day of November, 1789.

The ironclad Infidel of Indianapolis, never suspecting the gushing proclamation to be a forgery, has reprinted it, with a lame apology for "the father of his country, G. W."

The pious forger ought to hav ascertained that the 26th day of November, 1789, was not Thursday but Friday.

AN ARITHMETICAL DETECTIV.

Mr. W. E. Brown says that according to an "Excelsior Perpetual Almanac" February 17, 1800, was Sunday. If the Almanac says so it is wrong. I hav a quick and certain method of ascertaining the day of the week for any date this side of Anno Domini 0. I clipped the "Arithmetical Curiosity" from a newspaper Dec. 31, 1882. It was credited to A. G. Palmer in the Terre Haute Gazette.

The change in the calendar deducting ten days, was made by the pope in 1582. BURR.

Max Muller on Buddhism.

During the stay of Prof. Max Müller in Glasgow, where he gave a series of lectures, a dinner was given in his honor. On this occasion the professor related the following incident: "Some years ago a Japanese gentleman, who was embassador at Washington, called at my home at Oxford to hav a half hour's conversation. I was just then eating my breakfast; still I received him. What did he wish? 'You are acquainted with all religions,' said he. 'I myself am an educated man and consequently in need of none, but our people in Japan may well want one. Tell me now, what religion shall we adopt? Pray, do not mention Christianity, for you know Christianity in Japan is too much mixed with politics, and the Christians hav proved themselvs to be very dangerous citizens, yes, even traitors. Consequently, there can be no talk about Christianity; but any other religion you please to mention I will recommend.'

"I answered: 'Your honor, you hav already a very good religion in Japan; you hav Buddhism. Try for once to be sincere Buddhists; not outwardly only—not in ceremonies. Try to become what Buddha desired you should be. If you then should come to England, please call and let me know the results you hav gained.'"—Fritänkaren.

That Damnation Business.

When one complains, in the presence of a "believer," of the inequalities of human existence, the various bitter wrongs which hav no redress in this world, he is apt to be confidently assured that there is a better, where all will be righted. God, we are told, requires eternity to perfect his justice in.

On the other hand, it is being continually dinned into our ears that, at death, man passes to final judgment, after which his state of weal or woe is unchangeable.

Now, is this fair? God is supposed to be all-wise and all-powerful. Yet his government here is so disgraced by every species of wrong and confusion, as to amount to no government at all, but his apologists claim for him the full benefit of a doubtful future, which would avail the devil just as well; while poor man, who really requires more time to "learn the ropes" upon which his all depends, not being acquainted with "the nature of things" as God has been from all time, is allowed only just time enough to get his eyes open, before he is damned for stumbling over obstacles this almighty tyrant has pitched him among.

Mark you, were this poor man given another show, his conduct would, no doubt, show improvement, if not even yet perfection. But, no, this brutal tyrant makes unspeakable consequences hang on the instantaneous correct solution of the riddle which he has been ages on ages constructing by a mere unprepared infant.

What is the use of Universalists and Probationists harping on the pleasantness, or unpleasantness, of such a doctrin; as though if we found it pleasant we could make it true, or, if unpleasant, make it untrue? We hear people talk about believing this or that doctrin, or disbelieving the other, as if it were nothing but a question of choosing a novel. There is very little solid reason displayed on either side. But, to my mind, the very fact—the most patent fact of all human life—that not only justice, but infinit perfection, cannot accomplish its work in one such brief stage as a human life, entirely disproves the existence of hell, and sets the absurdity of belief in damnation, eternal or otherwise, in a very clear light. If God has all eternity to reach perfection in, man has it, too. Either they both hav it, or neither has it. Any God there is, must be just, since, without justice, he would not be God. If there is no God, of course the hell and damnation business falls to the ground in that case also. And all the miracles in the world, and all the old Jew books that ever were penned, would not shake my belief on this matter, any more than in the laws of geometry. BEDROCK.

Piling up the Persecutions.

DEAR MR. E. M. MACDONALD: Mr. Lennstrand is now by Suea Horäbt in Stockholm, sentenced to six months' imprisonment for blasphemy. This is only one of the three remaining undecided prosecutions. The months hav been doubled now and also the geometrical progression preferred. By that rate the merciful authorities intend most likely the next time to add a year. Within a day or two, I am removing to Stockholm, to be able to work to more purpose for Fritänkaren.

Our feelings are lacerated on account of the sufferings of Mr. Lennstrand, but we are not depressed; it will rather invigorate our energy.

CAPT. OTTO THOMSON.

Eskilstuna, Sweden, Dec. 19, 1889.

JAMES VINCENT, SR., makes a rather lame exposition of his attack through the United States court upon Medium Reid. Mr. Reid advertised to answer letters for $1. Mr. Vincent sent thirty-five cents, and further endeavored to seduce Mr. Reid from the path of virtue by holding out an implied promis of advertising patronage. Not obtaining a dollar's worth of deception for thirty-five cents he laid the case before Holy John, who had Reid indicted for fraudulent use of the mails. From Vincent's own standpoint he had no excuse for his action. Believing that spirits can communicate with men, he admits that Reid may be one of those through whom such communications are made. That to his questions no answer was returned is nothing against Reid, for all Spiritualists believe that the spirits cannot be ordered up at all times, and the failure to obtain an answer may therefore be the fault of the spirits and not of Reid. Mr. Reid probably put in thirty-five cents' worth of effort, and so considered that he had earned the money. Mr. Vincent now to defend his mean little action blossoms out as a full-fledged believer in governmental protection, and reasons about as brightly as would a man who should sue a saloonkeeper for selling him liquor to get drunk upon. His mind seems not to be strong enough to grasp the idea that if he had kept his money in his pocket Reid could not hav swindled him; but he must hav the government step in to prevent him from making a fool of himself. But if Mr. Reid should resort to the tu quoque style of answering Mr. Vincent, the latter gentleman might himself be put in the prisoner's dock. Mr. Vincent advertises, and sends the advertisment through the mail, that he has answered the questions, "If a man die shall he liv again, and if so, how are disembodied spirits occupied?" in his book. Now, Mr. Vincent can bring no more proof that he knows anything about the other world than can Mr. Reid. And a jury would giv no more credence to Mr. Vincent's claim than they would to Mr. Reid's. So if some one should send thirty-five per cent of Mr. Vincent's price for his humbug book to the office of Christna, and failed to get the book or any satisfactory evidence about the other world, the disappointed individual could as fairly go to Holy John and get Mr. Vincent indicted for fraudulent use of the mails as Mr. Vincent went to him in the case against Reid. The editor of Christna fails to see that these things are solely matters between two individuals, with which the general government has no business. And Mr. Vincent may liv to regret his advocacy of moral supervision of newspaper advertisments and books, for he proposes to write a book which he has been warned will come under Comstock's notice. If he should, and Comstock gets after him, he will wish that he himself had never got after Reid. But if he makes his book so that Comstock cannot get him indicted for sending it through the mails, then is he fraudulently advertising it by allowing the impression to go out that it will be a trifle "off color," and thereby he brings himself under the statute which he has applied to Reid. Mr. Vincent seems to be an irresponsible and unreasoning person.

THE Catholic church authorities of Ontario recently found another way of fleecing their flocks. They purchased a bell for a church at Billing's Bridge, and after it was hung set apart a day for blessing it. When the bell had been blessed and before the dismissal of the congregation, the ceremony was concluded by the ringing of the bell, first by the archbishop and clergy and then by members of the congregation, each ring being accompanied by an offering from the ringers. How many dollars they picked up in this way does not appear, but the bogus contributions of the archbishop and clergy probably led a good many laymen into making heavy donations.

THE program of the Newark Liberal League for the remaining Sundays of this month is as follows: Sunday, 12th, Dr. Alex. Wilder, of Newark, subject, "Cremation;" Sunday, 19th, Mrs. Dr. Huldah Gunn, of New York, subject, "The Chinese Question;" Sunday, 26th, John R. Charlesworth, of New York, subject, "Supernaturalism and Morality." The League meets at its hall, Market and Halsey streets, at 3 P.M.

Religious Feeling.

It is generally supposed, and vigorously asserted by theologians, that man is separated from other vertebrate animals principally by his being possessed of religious feeling. That the assertion is entirely unfounded we propose to show in this paper.

According to theology a human being consists of a body and an immortal soul, while according to science all beings endowed with a nervous system are composed of body and mind. The latter is again divided into two proximate components, feelings and the relations between feelings, of which the former are separated into two classes, peripherally initiated feelings, or sensations, and centrally initiated feelings, or emotions.

But while the mental life of the invertebrates and lower vertebrates is as yet almost unknown to us, such is far from being the case with higher vertebrates, including man. From innumerable observations made in physiology, psychology, and anatomy we hav by comparison and induction established as a scientific truth, that the difference in mental development existing between lower and higher animals is one of degree, not one of kind. The scientific demonstration of this truth caused an astonishing progress in psychology, which from being a part of philosophy has become a natural science, and as such founded on observation and classification of, and induction from, natural events.

Ourselvs and our environments, near or remote, we are conscious of only through impressions made upon various parts of our nervous system, but just as the sensations arise all, directly or indirectly, from physical causes, so the ultimate result of mental activity is invariably a succession of physical phenomena, which make themselvs manifested in a muscular activity that givs birth to physical events.

It is a well-known fact that when one is subject to a very activ cerebral excitement, no matter whether this is caused by the multiform impressions resulting from both conscious and unconscious complex-reflex nervous action, as, for instance, in case where a man is proposing and until he receives the lady's answer, after which a return to the normal state gradually takes place, or whether the excitement is caused by intense study of one or another object, there is a corresponding increase of vascular action, and a larger quantity of blood passes during a definit time through certain parts of the vascular system. I say "certain parts." It is only in those arteries and veins which are connected with blood-supply of such a part or parts as perform the extra labor that an increase is noted. Thus during sleep, whether natural or artificial, the volume of the brain decreases, while that of the members, especially the forearm, increases, and vice versa in waking condition. Hence we can safely conclude, what furthermore has been demonstrated by several eminent scientists, that the increase and decrease of a certain part or parts of an animal body is due respectivly to the expansion and contraction of blood-vessels.

Now, every exertion, muscular or mental, requires the expenditure of a certain amount of vital energy, which is rendered by existing tissues, to the rebuilding of which the vascular system furnishes the necessary material, but if the general vitality is so low that the necessary amount of constructiv agents cannot be furnished, or if the exertion is so prolonged that the expenditure continues to exceed the income for a certain time, then the member containing the seat of activity becomes tired, and the general lowering will by repeated mental exertion result at last in amnesia. Thus we see, that not alone all mental actions—hence, of course, religious feeling and emotion—are directly or indirectly due to physical causes and result in physical events, but also that the sustaining force, the life-giving principle, without which existence is impossible, is likewise dependent upon physical phenomena and composed of physical elements, as albumen, chlorides of sodium and potassium, protogen, phosphate of potash, etc. Hence it follows that no such thing as mental life, mental activity, as a part distinct from and independent of material causes, is possible. Consequently matter is the alpha and omega, the first and last, as well as the very essence, of existence.

"This may all be true," I hear some Christians exclaim, "but religious feelings are not of the ordinary kind. They are the very essence of God made manifest to us through the Holy Ghost. Amen!" Is the Christian right? I fortunately being an Infidel, my belief does not alone prevent me, but in fact compels me, to investigate; hence it is my duty to inquire into the truth of every statement that comes in the form of authoritativ assertion, whether emanating from natural or supernatural beings. I ask the question, What is religious feeling? Not caring for a Christian, a non-scientific, explanation, we turn for information to more reliable authorities, and receive the answer that religious feeling is in cultivated beings of a very complex nature, and that to seek its ultimate components we must leave the human species and inquire into the mental life of other vertebrate species.

It has been asserted by men like Comte, Darwin, and Herbert Spencer that animals are capable of fetichistic notions, and finally demonstrated by Prof. Tito Vignoli that all vertebrates do hav fetichistic ideas. The latter statement may be new to some of my readers, therefore it will be necessary to dwell on this point for a short time at least.

According to statements made by travelers and missionaries, the fundamental trait of religions believed in by savage tribes is that they work upon the mind of the believer almost solely by arousing his fear and dread. Furthermore, we know that the proximate sources of these religions are partly of astral and meteorological character, partly due to the double meaning of words, to man's tendency to attribute a consciousness like his own to all things, to the universal existence of worship of the dead, and to echoes, visions, dreams, and shadows. So much being admitted, we hav yet to answer the question, what causes man to attribute personality to all these objects?

Animals as well as men communicate with each other and their environments through their senses, and they, like us, can perceive and do know the difference between animate and inanimate objects. Yet it must not be supposed that the latter are by the animal regarded as disconnected with his life governed by natural laws. Far from it. They lacking the analytical faculty, both "the actual and inanimate thing is," says Vignoli, "presented to it [the animal] only by the intrinsic, peculiar, personal, and psychical quality of the animal itself," hence every object, fact, and phenomenon of nature is by the animal vivified and animated. That is, it becomes a live being endowed with will and power. This being the case, we can easily understand how under certain circumstances even the most tame and gentle animal or bird will hav an attack of fear when any unwonted object or noise suddenly appears within its vision or hearing.

After reading Vignoli's excellent essay ("Myth and Science," International Scientific Series, Vol. xl), I resolved a year ago last summer to inquire personally into the same subject. I will, however, not tax the reader's patience with enumerating my various experiments, but will confine myself to a single one. I was at that time owner of a hound, which received his daily meals served upon a dark-brown plate. One day I did not feed the dog until evening, when, after heating the plate in the oven, I opened the door and called him in. He proceeded with more than usual activity to the plate, burnt his nose and one paw, gave a yelp, and retired. I tried to coax him to renew his meal, but in vain; nor would he since that time eat from the above-mentioned plate. It is evident that he associated the burning sensation felt by him with the dark-brown plate, ascribing to it the power of hurting him, but this supposition presupposes that he through the external reflection and projection of his intrinsic and sentient faculty regarded the plate as a living and acting subject.

Thus we see that in the persons of animals is found a belief in the existence of will and consciousness in inanimate objects and phenomena. . And this belief is exactly the same as the one possessed by savage man, and it is only in virtue of his greater intelligence, his power of speech, and his ability of retaining the personality of the object in his memory—whereby it becomes the cause of hopes and fears so long as he livs—that he, man, is capable of modifying, enlarging, and grouping the results of his mental activity and thus creating a religion.

When man had arrived at that standpoint of mental development which enabled him through his anthropomorphistic and anthropopathic tendencies to endow every physical object with personality and make it subject to human joys and passions, he naturally sought to appease by prayers and offerings such object, or god, who, as he imagined, was evil or destructiv in his manifestations. And thus was laid the foundation of religious worship, which therefore is nothing but a simple recognizance of some power external to the individual. But the extension of this recognizance not being strictly defined, it follows that it is subject to oscillations. The extent is determined in every particular age by the opinion of each individual believer, yet at the same time it is externally subject to the interests, hence guidance, of certain classes or persons.

Now, in this recognizance of a supernatural being of undefined power and obscure characteristics lies the curse of religious feeling. It is this dread of him or it that has caused every religious persecution; that has directed and yet does direct the hostility of the believer in supernatural religion against science and her votaries. It is it which exterminated the Moors in Spain; which stripped naked the beautiful Hypatia and swung Peter the Reader's club. It is it that applied the fagot on occasion of every Auto-dâ-fê; that sent thousands of innocent women to the stake for witchcraft. And it is it which gave birth to the cruelties of the duke of Alva, to the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and to the Thirty Years' War. Hence, it can truthfully be asserted that when Christian religious feeling reaches a certain, and a not very great, intensity, it becomes decidedly negativ, purely destructiv.

But even in animals and savage man the religious feeling is not made up of fear solely. There are other natural factors, principally social instincts. To the dog's love of his master's approbation, to his shame when caught in an unlawful act, we hav a parallel in man's regard for the supposed wishes of his particular deity, and in the esteem in which he holds the good opinions of his fellow-men, and his shame and repentance. In fact, it can be said that what the deity is to man, the master is to the dog, and that the attitude of dog toward dog is like that of a savage to his fellow-beings. It cannot be denied that there is a vast difference between the moral and religious feeling of a cultivated Christian and those of a dog. But this is solely due to the greater mental development of the former, and it cannot be disputed that the difference is greater between an educated, rational Caucasian and a member of certain savage tribes, than between the latter and a dog. The claim that man is the only animal capable of having a moral sense or conscience is, I think, untenable. We know that other animals are in possession of a distinct self-consciousness and are capable of reflection; and it is this latter characteristic which constitutes the principal component of conscience. This moral sense becomes in time, through the belief in the influence of a supernatural being, to be associated with the religious feeling, and, like this, is supposed to emanate from the deity in some, to the believer, always mysterious way. It is to this infusion of natural morality into religion that is due the powerful hold of the latter over the views even of intelligent people. And yet it is proved by daily experience that morality is in no way dependent upon religious belief. And what is more, we hav ample and trustworthy evidence that among the Lepchas, Dhimáls, and other kindred tribes who possess no belief in a supreme, beneficent spirit—who hav no heaven, no hell, but with whom death ends all—is found a "singular forgiving of injuries," pure morals, and a love of truth, the equal of which no nation since its embrace of Christianity has ever possessed.

The most prominent feature of the Christian religion is its demand for complete submission to the will and wishes of the deity. Hence ever since the time of Christ Jesus it has been, "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done." The anti-social character of this sentiment I hav already pointed out, and I will therefore confine myself to its influence on the mental state of the individual.

In rational beings consciousness is only a succession of nervous shocks, which, following each other at a very rapid speed, are continually changing in intensity, and thus, by their unlike modes, producing the unlikeness among feelings. But the rationality is not of the same degree in all beings. In some persons the feelings, emotions, and passions are decidedly predominant, this principally among the fair sex. In others, reason has considerable power, and it naturally follows that those of the first-mentioned class are most susceptible to such impressions as appeal to their emotional nature. Now, supernatural religion does appeal solely to the emotions of the individual; never, since the truth of its assertions cannot be demonstrated, to his reason. Hence, inasmuch as we know that the exercise of a certain, in this case already highly developed, faculty, increases its strength, and at the same time, by its greater demand for nutrition, deprives other parts of it, which thereby are, at least for a time, arrested in their natural development, it is evident that the mental equilibrium becomes lost, and will and conscience are rendered comparativly weak when contrasted with instincts, desires, and passions. The individual has become a hysteric. And I do assert, and without fear of contradiction, that nine out of every ten fervent Christians are hysterical subjects. Follow me to the nearest camp-meeting or revival and you will not fail to perceive at least one individual whose upturned face shines with rapturous joy. She neither hears nor sees her surrounding fellow-worshipers. Touch her, she does not feel it. She went to the meeting that she might discover the road to heaven, and now she is on one of the many paths that lead to the lunatic asylum.

While in ecstasy we see only the result of impaired will, we hav in hallucinations a primary state of dissolution of personality. In a normal state there exists a correspondence between the mind and the external world. In hallucinations this correspondence does not exist; it is destroyed by the distortion and dislocation of certain elements of consciousness, which thereby become objectiv and endowed with independent existence. The Christian hallucinate hears, sees, and feels the presence of one or another heavenly being. Before leaving the subject, I will mention a certain abnormal mental state which I find has been only slightly noted. This state, which I will call "partial hallucination," we frequently meet with, and always in persons of apparently good mental health. The primary cause of this state is, I am sure, physical.

The partial hallucinate is remarkable for her love for Jesus. Whence this great, this unnatural love? There is in every person a certain amount of affection, which, when caused by circumstances not to follow its natural outlet, will seek some new channel, which, if the individual is emotional, will be an imaginary being, who forthwith becomes an idealized reproduction of the original but unattainable object. Christianity furnishes two excellent subjects round which affections can be misplaced, Christ Jesus and the Virgin. Look around and you will see that such extreme lovers of Christ and Mary are found in the ranks neither of happy wives nor of happy mothers, but in girls that suffer from disappointment in love; nor among men that glory in the name of husband or father, nor among students or well-educated persons, but among soft-minded young men, among members of the Young Men's Christian Association.

This idealistic love will affect the nervous system. Mental disorders will follow. The nerve tubes and cells will undergo a process of degeneration, causing at last the latter to disappear. In short, the unhappy individual will become a sufferer from progressiv amnesia.

Yea, the ways of the Lord are many and wonderful. Then, he has many other paths over which he sends his worshipers to the lunatic asylum as thanks for their devotion to and love for him. I might point out several such; for instance, the one that is found in the relation of crime to insanity, but space will not permit it. Yet before closing this essay it will be necessary, in order to know the full extent of our heavenly father's love, to see how the religious feelings of parents influence the mental state of their progeny.

Any person acquainted with the laws of heredity knows that through direct heredity any trait, physical or mental, can be transmitted from parent to child, and that through reversional heredity, or atavism, a child can resemble a remote ancestor, or even a distant member of a collateral branch.

We hav seen how religion, by increasing the strength of the emotional faculties, lowers the general intelligence and very frequently produces, as a perusal of the daily newspapers proves, even insanity. Now, there is a time, which begins at the appearance of the first mental disorder and ends when the person is discovered to be insane, during which he is at full liberty. The person can marry and hav children, and, owing to the strong sexual appetite which is an eminent characteristic of idiots, there will probably be many of them. Hence the evil is increased. Then, these children will all possess the germ of the same affliction the parent suffers from. It may come to light soon, but seldom does before middle age is reached, and they hav had the chance to transmit the same germ. Sometimes the germ may be latent, and the mental disorder first appear in the third generation, and then, perhaps, since it is liable to transformation, in a different form. Convulsions, for instance, may become hysteria.

Is there no remedy whereby this evil can be exterminated? Can we not isolate, and perhaps destroy, those brain-cells which are the seat of religious feeling? I think not. Even if we could destroy such cells, new ones would be built right away. The germ is in the organization of the person. Then, religious feeling is not a simple but a very complex feeling, and to put an end to its existence we would hav to rearrange and redistribute the different states of consciousness, which is an impossibility. But we can, by giving our children a scientific education, by keeping them outside the influence of religion, by teaching them ethics in place of theological morality, at least arrest the development of the religious sentiment and perhaps direct their hopes, their love, and their energies in other, and to mankind more profitable, channels. And let our own lives be in conformity with the dictates of reason and the laws of nature, for on physical health depends mental development. GUSTAVE NELSON.

To Any Infidel.

John Peck, like many other believers and unbelievers, seems to hav rather gross, vulgar, and sensuous ideas of Spiritualism. But such conditions of mind are nothing new or disappointing, for the masses of the people are and always hav been in that predicament.

I presume Brother Peck knows better, or is not so ignorant as he affects, but for the purposes of inquiry and discussion assumes this attitude to perplex and worry this sincere but deluded and misguided class of honest believers.

He is rather severe, if not cruel, in putting their faith to such rigid tests, by asking them such tough and knotty questions, when he knows they cannot answer them, and thus driving them mercilessly to the wall and leaving them there helpless and defenseless.

Brother Peck was, no doubt, at one period of his life a believer or follower of some sort of spiritualism. He has had a very fortunate childhood if he escaped all lessons and influences of this kind. And it should make him the more charitable and tender toward those who became victims of the spirits and cannot rid themselvs of their beliefs.

May I remind him that no one of us is wholly responsible for his belief or unbelief? He admits that this faith or "these ideas are grand enough to make every good man wish them true." Then why, the Spiritualist asks, do you want to take this comfort, these grand ideas, from us, and leave us without all that consolation they afford?

Believers in popular grades of spiritualism in the church and out of it cherish their "grand ideas" and indulge in them at interludes to mitigate their sorrows in passing through "this vale of tears."

There are many fanciful and ingenious forms and types of spiritualism. They are offshoots and spurious developments, spots, or morbid outgrowths from the one original philosophic root.

The fervid imagination of priest and prophet, of bigot and enthusiast, of the "spiritual" guides and religious leaders of the ignorant multitudes, hav invented and are responsible for all the spiritual folly and absurdities that beleaguer and bewilder society.

That there is one real and true spiritualism which, in its primitiv simplicity, is formulated, believed, and taught by the philosophers and wise men of all nations, is an undoubted truth. It is one of the postulates of science and philosophy that nothing in nature is lost—that the forms of matter change only; that the properties, endowments, or vital forces that animate it are innate, and by conservation of energy cannot perish but are immortal and reproduced in new forms of life. So that in the death and dissolution of the body there is really nothing lost either of the matter or of the vital force or spirit that animated it and was manifested through it. The physical, mental, and moral influence of a living being is impressed indelibly and eternally on existences. They may not be specifically recognized, nevertheless they remain in some measure and are working themselvs out, often so definitly in offspring, in attitudes, postures, modes of thought and feeling, of habits of action and conduct, as to bring vividly in view the life or spirit of the deceased parent. So that we can truly say that the spirit of the parent is present impressing the offspring.

While the corporeal form passes away, or is transmuted, and is forever gone from the outward vision, the accumulated wealth of spiritual power inherited, as transmitted from a succession of ancestors, is preserved and bequeathed as a legacy from generation to generation eternally. This immortal, spiritual legacy is not the inheritance of the one family alone, but ramifies in and permeates society in a degree that is limitless. In this sense the spirit of man not only livs, but is immortal. In this sense the spirit of a deceased person is recognized as being present with us.

When thrown into an abnormal state by surrendering our will or self-assertion to the influence or to the conditions, we hear, see, and feel many strange manifestations.

In the foregoing Brother Peck may see that I am a Spiritualist, but I am not going to gratify him by telling him "where it (the spirit) is located; whether in the brain or nerves or heart or stomach." Neither will I tell him "whence did it come." Nor will I answer any of his taunting, trifling, impertinent questions. If any other Spiritualist feels it is his duty to descend to such a task, if he does not implicate me, I will not interfere. But if Brother Peck and intelligent Spiritualists would engage in the task of purifying Spiritualism of all its spurious elements, its corruptions, of the falsehoods and follies that hav been engrafted on to it, that hav made it a misnomer and monstrosity, they would do humanity an invaluable service.

We owe the crude, empirical, personificatory theories of Spiritualism, not to the Jews, but to the Greeks. Their literature is charged with demons, gods, ghosts, and spirits. Our language, literature, theology, and religion hav largely been derived from them. They had about all the learning, the wisdom, and civilization in Europe at one period.

We are indebted to them for much that we retain that is sacred to us because of its antiquity. Our New Testament is the source and authority for much that is called Spiritualism. We derived this literature from them. They honestly put into this record the prevailing faith of the more ignorant Greek writers, to adapt it to the undeveloped minds and superstitious fears of our barbarian European ancestors. We hav this as our sacred literature. Shall we believe, or be damned?

The church is built on this Greek faith, as taught in "holy writ." Modern Spiritualism is but a modified, yet faithful, offspring of this ancient mother of our holy religion. Why should we ridicule or criticise them for their fidelity to this holy faith transmitted from their fathers? The more divided the believers, the more discussion. If we will giv them time they will expose and explode each other's errors and rectify themselvs. Let us enlighten them and not torment them with such exacting demands. They hav not been taught to answer such questions, and they feel it irreverent to ask them. All this mythological Spiritualism commends itself to the faith, not to the reason and intelligence. Brother Peck, do not ask us too much. Giv us a rest.

The Clergy at the Secular Union Congress.

I hav waited some time to see the discussion of the movements of the American Secular Union. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 30th is an article by Mr. J. H. Burnham, who uses some very strong and unnecessary language in describing the actions of the Congress. Arguments are desirable and debate is necessary, but epithets and ribaldry are neither.

The gentlemen—clergymen, if you please—who spoke on the platform of the American Secular Union, supported the movement by their addresses, oratory, power, presence, influence, and ability. I should like Mr. Burnham to demonstrate wherein this was "bowing and cringing at the feet of clerical impudence." Then think of "a call formulated in the terms of distress." Is not ecclesiasticism and church power distressingly apparent? Is not the exemption of church property distressingly common? Is not the power of the Catholic priesthood in suppressing our public schools distressingly apparent? And has not the apathy of the Liberals been a distressing circumstance? There are people who are pleased to call themselvs Christians who hav opinions of their own, believe in church taxation, in keeping religion out of the public schools, and take the liberty of differing with the minister and the Bible, and are honest, and are therefore desirable in helping to giv our cause momentum.

Mr. Burnham's idea seems to be that the American Secular Union is in existence for the destruction of the Christian religion and superstition. I hope this is not so, but I also hope that this will eventually be accomplished by different societies and means. Mr. Burnham also shows some signs of hero-worship in his reference to "our honored dead." The dead hav no vote in the Congress of the American Secular Union—although they hav labored well, and accomplished much in their way.

Mr. Charlesworth has a very good article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 14th. He "apparently" understands the policy and objects of the American Secular Union, but he wants the Union to be a religious iconoclast, and fight the Christian religion and obliterate it with all its appurtenances. Then he supposes a committee composed of "Christians and Secularists," "a Secular member rises to propose that a portion of the Union's funds shall be employed for the extension of Secularism, and as a means to such end he advises to send about the United States individuals whose business it should be to do all in their power to expose the errors of Christianity and establish the truths of Secularism." That member should be promptly sat on. I should vote against his proposition, and it would be the duty of each member to do so, or vice versa.

Mr. Charlesworth defines a Christian, but I fear he could find few that would acquiesce to his ideas as to what constituted a Christian. He must remember that people are no longer the slaves and automatons they once were, and that some refuse to be kept in an orthodox strait-jacket; are honest, courageous, and pleased to define themselvs Christians. There are others that believe the church has a good influence over its ignorant members, who do not call themselvs Christians. This class is by no means small, but never forget that the struggling poor must help pay the taxes of the churches.

To Liberal Women.

NATIONAL LIBERAL WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION.

Arrangements hav been perfected for organizing a Women's Liberal Association of a national character.

1. Women's political enfranchisement progresses slowly because women of the present national societies hav ceased to take advance steps—are in fact retrograding. This conservativ tendency, noticeable for some time, has at last reached a point where a new and advance society should be inaugurated. Its needs are imperativ.

2. The efforts made by Catholics and Protestants alike—the Christian party in politics—to unite church and state by means of legislation and amendments to the federal Constitution, are proof of an impending crisis in political affairs, which needs extreme watchfulness on the part of Radicals to prevent the destruction of such liberty as we now possess. One of the most efficient aids of this party, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, at its recent Chicago convention adopted resolutions indorsing the "God in the Constitution" plan.

Many women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union we believe to be ignorant of the intentions of the leaders, and should be warned of the danger of their course to free institutions, and to all liberty both political and religious.

For these and similar reasons, women interested in the purposes mentioned are invited to unite in a national society, whose initial convention will be held in Washington, D. C., Feb. 24, 25, 1890.

Persons in sympathy with this object are invited to correspond with me. I will receive contributions in furtherance of the movement. Editors are invited to notice this announcement.

The Pictures.

Those who hav sent lists of subscribers to aid in defraying the expenses of the pictures will find their communications printed in the "Letters from Friends," either in this issue of the paper or in forthcoming issues as soon as space permits. As yet the number sent falls very far below the number necessary, but our friends are doing well, and if the names continue to come for a few more weeks as numerously as they hav during the past week we shall be able to keep Mr. Heston's pen busy and provide him something to eat three times a day.

In addition to the new subscribers sent, we find pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of the subjoined sums as donations to "help continue the pictures:"

Arthur I. Flint	$1 00	L. Magenheimer	$1 00
E. N. Dunckel	1 00	D. M. Angus	50
F. D. Wright	1 00	William Hart	3 00
A. Laurie Sailor	1 00	L. W. Tatus	1 00
Samuel Gray	1 00	Fred Koezly	2 00
Newton Whitehead	4 15	Thomas Knight	50
C. C. Johnson	2 00	J. R. Perry	1 00
J. W. Storrs	1 00	R. E. George	50
M. Fell	1 00	R. Butterfield	20 00
Mrs. T. S. Olds	2 00	John Kane	1 75
John D. Powers	3 00	J. Mahara	1 00

Mr. W. L. Johnson and Mr. L. DeWitt Griswold each promis $3 over the subscription price if the pictures are maintained. Our old friend, R. Butterfield, in sending his bright silver note, says:

"SACRAMENTO, CAL., Dec. 30, 1889.

"DEAR SIRS: I am sorry to learn that the Truth Seeker Company are so much in need of help to enable them to carry on the work of publishing THE TRUTH SEEKER. It would be a great backset to the cause of Liberalism if the journal is discontinued. There would be great rejoicing in the orthodox camp over the death of their greatest enemy. I do not believe the friends of Freethought will allow THE TRUTH SEEKER to die for want of proper nourishment.

"I will be one of five hundred to donate $20 per year unti the company can stand alone. Inclosed find $20, silver note, to support THE TRUTH SEEKER and Heston's pictures.

"Yours truly, R. BUTTERFIELD."

Our friend De Lespinasse, of Orange City, Iowa, sends us $5 and says:

"In the begging line you are N. G.—[which we hav learned from our Devil means 'no good']. You had better hire old Putnam for three months. He knows how to get hold of the shekels."

We congratulate our esteemed contemporary upon the possession of so valuable a faculty; but if he is so successful he will probably not hire himself out. And as to his being old, we warn Dr. De Lespinasse that for intimating such a thing he will be obliged to flee the wrath to come when youthful Mr. Putnam wends his way eastward. Thirdly, we are not begging. When Mr. Heston was engaged, two years ago, we said that without a larger number of subscribers the additional expense would be greater than the paper could bear. The first year, our friends gave us the necessary increase. The second year efforts slackened, and the burden fell upon the paper. Unable to stand it, we simply ask our friends what they will do about it. The Cause is theirs as well as ours. The pictures are an effectiv weapon in fighting for that cause; if they desire to continue its use, it is but a slight thing for five hundred of the many thousands of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to obtain an additional subscriber. Many, as the responses show, can obtain four or five. We are not begging at all, but simply furnishing value for money received.

Here is some more encouragement. The author of "Try-Square," a book advertised on page 29 of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, makes this generous offer:

"I notice that the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER wants 500 new subscribers immediately. To assist in obtaining them, I hereby tender to the Truth Seeker Company five hundred copies of the book called 'Try-Square, or the Church of Practical Religion,' to be given as premiums to, or for, new subscribers, who subscribe and pay the regular price for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, within sixty days from the first announcement of the offer in THE TRUTH SEEKER. One copy of the book to be given to every volunteer subscriber, and one to every old subscriber who procures a new one at the regular price of $3."

This is a valuable offer. The book is handsomely bound in cloth, and sells for $1. It is worthy of the good opinion and patronage of Liberals, and we warmly urge our friends to avail themselvs of the offered premium within the next sixty days—to March 11th. The aim of the book is to encourage organization of Liberals. The author (who desires to remain in seclusion) sees the vast power wielded by the churches, due to their perfect organization, reaching into every neighborhood; and he sees also a nearly equal number of people of Liberal tendencies nearly without power or influence for lack of such organization. In his book he seeks to encourage and show the way to organization. There is enough of narrativ in the book to giv the readers a personal acquaintance with the characters depicted, and cause them to follow the attempt to found a church without superstition with more than a critical interest. We hope to be able to use the five hundred copies as the author wishes within the next sixty days.

We thank Mr. Butterfield heartily for his munificent gift. If we had such a fund as his proposal would afford, what a rattling of the dry bones of orthodoxy we could cause! May the other 499 be speedily found! And thanking, also, the author of "Try-Square," and the other friends whose exertions hav added to our subscription list, and whose generosity has helped materially in our need, we ask all patrons and goodwishers to consider some one of the methods of aid suggested in this brief statement and do for us what they can do best.

The Sabbath Union's Report.

It is said that Colonel Ingersoll once said that when he undertook the conduct of a law case he cared less to know what his client could prove than he did to know what the other fellow could prove. Understanding that, he was ready for business. As we believe Colonel Ingersoll to possess great common sense as well as great oratorical gifts, the statements made in the "advance sheets of addresses on the civil Sabbath, by Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, secretary of the American Sabbath Union," will probably be learned with interest, and with some glee, by the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. With interest, to know what the other fellow has done; and with glee, because he hasn't done more.

"No other year of the last twenty-five," begins Mr. Crafts, "has seen so many petitions against Sunday work, the organization of so many Sabbath associations, the fighting of so many brave battles against Sunday saloons, the winning of so many victories under the banner inscribed, 'The Barber's Sunday,' the writing of so many articles and letters, and the utterance of so many fearless addresses and sermons, in behalf of this imperiled day, as the year now about to close. This is the Annus Mirabilis, the year of wonders, in Sabbath reform—and in Sabbath breaking also." Of course the Christians are with Mr. Crafts in his crusade against American liberty, and with their aid he has done a good deal of practical work toward enslaving the people to the churches. It is natural that Connecticut, which once enacted a law against the "profanation of the Lord's day" the penalty whereof was death, should be called by Mr. Crafts the banner state. This title to infamous fame has been achieved by reducing Sunday work on the railroads, though even in that the state has fallen far behind the desires of the Sabbath Union people. Mr. Crafts says:

"For railroad purposes in Connecticut legislators hav decided that not twenty-four hours, but a sacred seven, half on each side of noon, shall constitute the rest day. Freight trains, with certain needless exceptions, are forbidden from sunrise to sunset, but such trains as may be worked by 'mercy and necessity,' the railroad commissioners may permit on Sabbath morning, and so milk trains and newspaper trains are allowed, on the ground, I suppose, that it is as necessary for men to hav their scandals fresh as for babies to hav fresh milk. Even Connecticut's star, you perceive, does not shine with unclouded light, but there is at least circumstantial evidence that the Sabbath is not there surrendered in the fact that they are able to defend, year after year, the ten thousand railroad men from whom even their imperfect law struck the iron chains of their Sunday slavery."

Connecticut, therefore, may be said to hold her own in hypocrisy as well as in bigotry; for if Sunday should be observed at all as a sacred day, every moment of it should be regarded. There can be no compromise in the matter.

In Boston, the chief work of the Sabbath Union has been in closing saloons. In New York, "one important victory for Sabbath reform," says Mr. Crafts, "is the recent payment to the Metropolitan Museum of the $400,000 appropriated to it by the state legislature which struck out a condition that it should open on Sunday—a condition which the mayor, attempting to swell into a whole legislature, restored on his own authority, but, after much bulldozing of the trustees, has had to drop at last. It is to be hoped that he and other mayors will cease their attempts to veto state laws." One reason why Mr. Crafts's party won this is because the mover in the Sunday opening agitation is rather tired of fighting this battle alone. If the people are not willing to continue the war, they can stay out of the museums on Sundays. We regret to note, too, that the friend of Sunday opening in our state senate will not be there this session. The only other victory in this city over which Mr. Crafts can crow, is the tricky success of the Sabbatarians of the Fifth avenue stage line, but this is somewhat lessened, though Mr. Crafts fails to mention it, by the attitude of the city authorities who refuse to allow Mr. Shepard to charge ten cents fare unless he runs his stages on Sundays.

In Pennsylvania the bigots are triumphant in the three greatest cities—Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Scranton. In Philadelphia Wanamakerism rules; in Pittsburgh, the Law and Order League—a band of conspirators against freedom—are successful, and in Scranton, Mr. William E. Dodge has influenced the D. L. & W. railroad to withdraw Sunday trains. The Pennsylvania road, too, and the Vanderbilt lines hav withdrawn some Sunday trains. On the latter road, and probably on the former, the men are made to do seven days' work in six for six days' pay. Upon this matter of Sunday observance by railroads Mr. Crafts comments:

"It will be appropriate to mention here, though belonging to the whole country, as one of the pleasant surprises of the year, a group of confessions from sixty-five railroad officials. In response to a list of questions, these presidents, superintendents, managers, and other high officials of the railroads, with only nine exceptions, admit that there is 'more Sunday work done by the railroads than is necessary;' that the work could be 'lessened without loss either to the roads or to the public;' that 'the railroad work now done in seven days could be done in six'—some would make exceptions for perishable freight and live stock. Many of them believe 'the work could be done better in six days than in seven, because of the better condition of the engineers and other employees.' Best of all, thirty-one declare that there is no real obstacle to 'the complete suspension of inter-state Sunday trains.' The answers of most of these indicate that they see no obstacle to stopping all Sunday trains. One railroad president concisely proclaims the remedy for this needless Sunday work: 'The only way is to hav a special act of Congress making it a general law.' Many of these officials hav signed the petitions for such a law. Here certainly are several wonders. It is a grateful surprise to many that the railroad officials are not generally to join with the Infidels and saloonists and Sunday papers and Seventh Day Adventists in resisting the plea of the workingmen for a Sunday rest law."

But, on the whole, the best Sabbath-keeping section of the country is found by Mr. Crafts to be along the Atlantic coast, from Delaware to Mississippi. This, however, is as natural as the bigotry of Connecticut. That portion of the country is the least developed, the least enterprising, and we had almost written the least civilized. But it is certainly the most conservativ part of the land in social customs, and the most backward in progress except Arkansas. Georgia is the banner state of persecution of small Christian sects. The negroes are lazy and naturally incline to rest days. That these statements are true, is shown by Mr. Crafts's addition to his remarks, of this: "Railroads, with the aid of the United States mails, are making ugly breaches in the wall of Sabbath rest, and the 'New South's' manufacturing attractions bring new perils with new gains, which make it important for the friends of the Sabbath there to organize more thoroughly for its defense." Progress, commerce, manufactures, are great displacers of old religious and social notions, and the "sacredness" of Sunday must go with the rest.

The part which Mr. Harrison and Mr. Wanamaker hav taken in the work of the Sabbath Union is introduced by the Union's secretary with these words: "Thank God, if we hav not a Sabbath-keeping Congress, we hav at least a Sabbath-keeping president and cabinet." Mr. Harrison's share of glory was earned by this order to the army:

"The president, commander-in-chief of the army and navy, desires and enjoins the orderly observance of the Sabbath by the officers and men in the military and naval service. The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiment of a Christian people and a due regard for the divine will, demand that Sunday labor in the army and navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity."

Mr. Wanamaker's task has been to "reform" the mail distribution. "He has emancipated," so says this report, "not a few from the Sunday slavery by the four reductions he has already made—in the department, on Star routes, on pleasure routes, and in the money order division—and will doubtless do much more in this line; but, in any case, law will be needed if only to make his reforms outlast his own term. In his report to Congress, which contains two pages on 'Sunday Mails' (pp. 23, 24), he plainly intimates that reductions of Sunday work in the post-offices will be very difficult and very slight so long as the railroads are required to dump their loads of mail into the offices on the Sabbath as on other days."

These two latter eminent gentlemen are also willing to aid the Sabbath Union in procuring a Sunday law for the District of Columbia. At present there is none, which, says the Union, "puts the capital, with France and California, outside the pale of Christian civilization."

The Union also finds encouragement in the resolution of the Baltimore lay congress, the corporation of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and the action of church councils, conferences, synods, presbyteries, and individual ministers in different parts of the country. In some cities local fanatics hav done great damage to the business interests of the places, and infringed on the liberties of the citizens, by closing all places of amusement and business, and Mr. Crafts rejoices thereat. The Union itself is now organized in twenty-one states, besides city and county associations, and three more states hav taken the preliminary steps for organization.

On the other hand, the Union has found many discouraging obstacles to its work. New England, which from its ancestral bigotry and religious cruelty Mr. Crafts expects to lead in his work, is not a unit on the question of Sunday observance. The point he makes "is that New England is in peril from Sunday work and Sunday dissipation, and is doing next to nothing to save itself or the country from this danger. It seems to be sliding in its sleep, waiting to be waked up by a smashup at the foot of the hill, like Cincinnati. In Sabbath reform, New England is slowly retreating, while the Central states are charging the foe. The only conference of ministers, so far as I know, that has declined to indorse the petition to Congress against Sunday trains and Sunday mails is the 'New England conference.' Massachusetts passes by on the other side, indifferent to the wounds inflicted on her Sabbath law, which, not long ago, fell among thieves, who mangled it and stripped it, in the interest of greed and lust, and left it more than half dead because every drop of equity had flowed out of it. It forbids the poor to open their penny shops on the Sabbath, but authorizes the railroad millionaires to sell their tickets and keep their employees at work."

Turning to what are called the "Middle states," Mr. Crafts finds things equally bad. "New York," he says, "like Massachusetts, has left her mangled Sunday law through another year unhealed. Worse than the crimes against equity in its exceptions is the absurdity of its penalty. If the half friends of the Sabbath wrote the 'amendments,' surely the out-and-out enemies wrote the penalty, which is equivalent to permission. Superintendent Murray told me how the hatters' clerks tried to close up the hat stores in their own protection. One of them bought a five-dollar silk hat as evidence. The seller was convicted and fined the full penalty, two dollars. He had made more than that on the hat. I spent the first Sabbath of the year, and another since, investigating New York streets, and there is scarcely any kind of toil or traffic that I did not find in progress somewhere. I started out to write down a list of the places open, but found it would be easier to make a record of the places closed." Mr. Crafts would probably like to see Connecticut's old-time penalty for profaning the Lord's day attached to New York's Sunday law. But he never will. New York is going ahead in this matter, not backward. Toronto is no example for this city, and the Sabbath bigots will hold it up in vain. It is safe to wager a thousand to one that Toronto will run horse-cars on Sunday before New York complies with the Union's demand and discontinues the practice.

Texas, too, is a bad place for Sabbatarians, though the Galveston News did advocate the shutting up of other businesses, to its own profit. The state givs the cities the power to regulate their own affairs on Sundays, and in Dallas alone, where a city ordinance closes business houses from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M on Sundays, Mr. Crafts counted twenty-nine kinds of business going on as usual. But out West, the country is going to the devil in this matter of Sunday observance even faster (according to Mr. Crafts) than Texas or New England. In Montana common labor is not forbidden. In Portland, Oregon, we are told, the heathen Chinese sell all kinds of provisions on the rest day, but the parallel American street is more heathen still in opening all its saloons. In Sacramento five-sixths of the shopkeepers on the principal street do seven days' work for six days' profits. San Francisco (in this respect like New York) allows even its ten-cent shows to corrupt the youth on Sunday. California has also been "the headquarters of the attack upon the Sabbath."

Thus the Sabbath Union's secretary sums up the pros and cons of his case for Sabbatarian bigotry, and finds that "with all that is hopeful there is much to alarm" the Union, the self-constituted guardian of the rest of the world. And we may perhaps turn his statement around and say that while there is much that is hopeful for the defenders of liberty to read, there is much to alarm them. The churches are rallying in a desperate effort to reënact that puritan legislation which made the clergy the most influential men of the town, and to hav it enforced, and in too many instances they hav succeeded or will succeed. To enforce it, they will find a more difficult matter in enlightened communities; but the mere presence of such laws on the statute books is a menace and a danger to the communities. Under them, at any time, bigots and fanatics can cause an infinit amount of cruel injustice to be done. Better it is that the laws now on the books should be repealed; we do not want any law forbidding the people to use Sunday as may best please them.

A New Women's Association.

The notice in another column signed by Mrs. Gage, calling a convention in Washington to organize a National Liberal Women's Suffrage Association, must be welcome indeed to the thousands of Liberal women in this country who hav worked for equal suffrage.

For several years the women's suffrage movement has suffered from its practical capture by the church, and the half-hearted support it has consequently obtained even by those who were supposed to be the champions of sexual equality at the ballot-box. It is not so very many years ago that a woman who thought herself qualified to vote, and said so, was denounced by the church as a heretic and revolutionist, an upsetter of the divine economy of nature, and a contemner of that glorious apostle who wanted wives to submit to and obey their husbands in all things. We can well remember the time when to advocate woman suffrage was thought to be only one degree less sinful than to agree with Thomas Paine. "Short-haired women and long-haired men" was the mildest term of obloquy and derision applied to the preachers of equal rights. Like the Abolitionists, they were spit upon and derided; called crazy, out of their sphere, heretics, and vain babblers. The church passed them by, and silently ostracized and practically excommunicated them. They and their works were of the devil, and consequently were disturbers to the saints, who knew all things and had got the world running aright.

But shortly a change came. When the war was over and the slaves free, there never was a Northern Christian who had not been an Abolitionist at least as far back as the last century. So when the woman suffragists won the public ear, and woman was slowly but surely obtaining her rightful equal position, the church changed its attitude. From the meanest and bitterest enemy of woman suffrage, the church began to crawl toward the position of perpetual friend to woman's claim. It saw that through woman suffrage it could more fully enslave the divine but deluded half of the race. The clergy then began to attend suffrage meetings, pray for the leaders, and offer to assist the work. Taking advantage of the average woman's piety, the church made rapid progress in swallowing the movement. Church organizations multiplied, and they all posed as the would-be saviors of woman. The Women's Christian Temperance Union voted a suffrage plank into its rules, not because, as Frances Willard herself said, it was really in favor of equal rights but because through the votes of women it could accomplish its real purpose. The church hopes by the aid of women to put God into the Constitution, the Christian religion into all statutes, state and national, enforce blasphemy laws, obtain a national constitutional amendment prohibiting liquor making and drinking, and to do other arbitrary and tyrannical things for the greater glory of God and the financial and theocratic welfare of his saints on earth. At the international women's council held in Washington in March, 1888, the female tools of the church had things nearly their own way. Had it not been for Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Mrs. Gage, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Scatcherd, Mrs. Dilke, and Mrs. Fassett, of England, and Judge Waite's wife, and a few others, the women suffrage movement would hav been committed to prohibition, God-in-the-Constitution, and other Christian schemes. As it was, Frances Willard managed to prevent all heretical utterances from reaching the public, the meetings were opened with prayer, hymns were printed in the official program, and every Infidel woman orator was asked to suppress her heresy and not wound the feelings of her religious sister. It was at this meeting, we imagin, that the Liberal women found out that their suffrage movement was being used to foist legalized Christianity upon the country, and it was there, too, that the revolt which induces the present call for a congress begun.

It will be recollected that at the close of the council, a meeting was called at the instance of Mrs. Stanton, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Dilke, and Mrs. Scatcherd, and was attended by about thirty of the ablest of the delegates who objected to making the movement a tail to the kite of the church. The sentiment of that supplementary meeting was directly opposed to Miss Willard's Methodist schemes, and the necessity was seen of separating the church from the movement, if woman's liberty was to be gained. The congress to be held next month is the indirect result of that supplementary meeting.

In the interest of political and religious liberty, as well as of woman suffrage, the Radical women of the country ought to attend the Washington congress.

The Literature Fund.

Since the last acknowledgment we hav received the following amounts for the Literature Fund:

J. Loveland	$6 75
Almond Owen	1 00
Judge S. Brewer	5 00
Thomas Knight	4 50
Previously acknowledged	29 75	$47 00

There is ample opportunity to use money sent for this fund. Montana and North Dakota legislatures hav not as yet been labored with on the Sunday question, and our national legislature must also hav a little light on the duties of government toward popular education. Report of work done with the money in hand will be given in a week or two.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10—$3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1890, 25 cents for the ANNUAL for 1890. The balance of $6.75 place to the credit of the Literature Fund. I hope to benefit some Christian heathen. Continue the pictures good and strong. Yours, I. LOVELAND.

WELLSLEY, MASS., Dec. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please enter the name of Sherman F. Denton on your subscription list to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year from present date and charge to my account, it being my contribution to the fund for continuing the cartoons, if you find that you can continue them.

ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON.

TOWNSHEND, VT., Dec. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL. I vote for the pictures, and will giv an extra dollar or two rather than hav them stopped. I would giv more for a Bible illustrated by Heston than any book I know of. REV. W. E. SCOTT.

MIDLAND, MICH., Dec. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find draft of $5.25. Credit me the $5 on subscription and send the ANNUAL when ready. I would vote no! on continuing illustrations. I think they act detrimentally to the interests of the paper by preventing many from subscribing. STOEL E. DEAN.

PORTVILLE, N. Y., Dec. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.25—the $1 to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I cannot do without, and twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890. Keep up the pictures if possible. I will try my best to get one or more subscribers. But we liv in a hell-fire town here.

JOHN R. COATS.

GOODLAND, IND., Dec. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.25 to renew subscription and for the ANNUAL. I hav been trying to get you a subscriber or two, and hope to succeed yet. When I do so you may record my vote most emphatically in favor of the pictures. They are a holy terror. C. L. JACOBS.

NORTH BEND, PA., Dec. 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been busy and hav had no time to get the new subscriber, but, pictures or no pictures, I want THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1890. Therefore please find inclosed $3.50 for the paper and the ANNUAL and the "Agnostic Annual." Also $1 to prove that I vote for the pictures.

Yours, etc., F. D. WRIGHT.

PRESCOTT, KAN., Dec. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and ANNUAL. I shall be very sorry to see the pictures discontinued, as I sincerely believe they are doing more good than harm. I think Mr. Parton has got the cart before the horse. I shall use my best efforts to get a new subscriber, but hav not much prospect of success. G. W. DENISON.

FRIEND, NEB., Dec. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6—$3 for my own renewal, and $3 for a new subscriber. I send the last name to aid the pictures. Yes, I am in favor of them. Those who are repelled by them would not read anything on the subject, and it would take a great deal to make things so plain as the pictures do. J. W. GILBERT.

LYONS, N. Y., Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to pay my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER two years in advance. I am now seventy-six years old; hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER fourteen years, and could not now get along very well without it. I think it is one of the best Liberal papers published. As far as the pictures are concerned, I am in favor of them, as I think they speak louder than words. I also inclose twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1890. C. B. TUCKER.

TACOMA, WASH., Dec. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I read an article on your pictures, which I should hate to see discontinued, and I am willing to help by sending you money for another paper to be sent to a friend. For my part, I had almost as soon go without the papers as hav the pictures left out of them. I would rather see two more, or even one on each page. W. D. ROBERTSON.

MIDDLE FALLS, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed $2 please extend my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER eight months. Since there is so much voting pro et con the cartoons, why not issue them in a supplement form each week, as many other journals do, and thus please both parties? Let those ordering the supplement pay extra for it, say $3 50 or $4 per annum.

Yours faithfully, D. LOUIS BODGE.

GEORGETOWN, COL., Dec. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As I cannot obtain a new subscriber, and not wishing the pictures discontinued, I inclose $2 toward THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would willingly make it more, but can not. Our opinion of the pictures is they are splendid object-lessons and convey much at a glance. A great deal would be lost by not having them.

Yours in favor of the pictures, MRS. T. S. OLD.

Dec. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10, for which please send the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, 25 cents; "The New God," 10 cents; Ingersoll's Defense of Reynolds, 50 cents; "Prose Poems and Selections," Ingersoll, $2 50; Paine's "Age of Reason," $1.50. Use the balance for pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. NEWTON WHITEHEAD, M.D.

PERRYSVILLE, PA., Dec. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $4—$3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, seventy-five cents for three TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS, the other twenty-five cents to go to help to keep up the pictures. Some of your readers would like them stopped to please some of their Christian neighbors. It would please them a good deal better to stop THE TRUTH SEEKER, pictures and all. ANDREW BEVERIDGE.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., Dec. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6.25, the $6 for the paper and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. Go on with the pictures. They do lots of good, by calling attention to much Bible matter that would never be read by a great many folks if they did not see the pictures. But do as you think best. I shall not stop my paper on account of pictures.

Truly yours, B. W. CONANT.

FORT CUSTER, MONT., Dec. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents, for which send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890. I would that I could send you a new subscriber as a vote in favor of the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I find that with the great majority of our common people ridicule and sarcasm is a more effectiv weapon than argument, and that your pictures carry a more convincing argument than all of the paper's solid reasoning. I hope to be able to send you a subscriber before long. Fraternally, ROSSEAU HESS.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Dec. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Pleased find inclosed draft for $8.25. Please renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years and send THE TRUTH SEEKER to a new subscriber (name inclosed) for one year, and please send me copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I am decidedly in favor of the continuance of the pictures, and trust that every subscriber who is in favor of the pictures will manifest his pleasure by at least securing one new subscriber for the paper.

Respectfully yours, FRANK W. GREAVES.

TRANSFER, PA., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: We must hav the cartoons, by all means. The powerful weapon of ridicule which Heston so skilfully uses strikes terror where it rightly belongs. If you who want the cartoons discontinued, hav any of the filthy orthodoxy still clinging to you, if you will only hold the fort a little longer the dawn of truth will come, striking conviction that they are a grand success. Hurrah for Heston. Please find $1 to help the good cause along. We will soon send you several new subscribers to the "Grand Old Paper."

M. FELL.

BOULDER, COL., Dec. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $6—$3 for my own renewal and $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER to a new subscriber. Please count two votes for the cartoons. I hav filled my part of the contract for the pictures, and hope all the other subscribers will do as well, or better. I would rather pay $4 a year for the paper than do without Heston's splendid productions. I renew my suggestion that the cartoons should be placed in a volume with sufficient explanations. It would be the best Freethought missionary in the world. If so published put me down for a copy at $10. JOS. WOLFF.

CLEAR CREEK, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $5.25—twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, $5 to renew my subscription and for a new subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am in favor of keeping the pictures going. I hav no fear that the pictures will shock the Christians' feelings, if reading the description of them in the Bible does not. They would not dare to take THE TRUTH SEEKER with the illustrations into the Young Men's Christian Association rooms, and show up what the ungodly Freethinkers are doing, for fear it would increase its circulation, and thin their ranks, by showing that the God that took a part in those Bible scenes is not the God of to-day, and that the God of to-day is not the God of the future. Which fact has just begun to crawl through the skulls of the Presbyterians, all on account of the outside pressure. Yours truly, HENRY ALLEN.

P.S.—Please send two ANNUALS. H. A.

LIBERAL, MO., Dec. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10 25 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, with the pictures, to the herein-named persons. The twenty-five cents is for a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. Now, if all the old subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER will do as much to increase its circulation as I hav done—and it is but little—I think we shall hav THE TRUTH SEEKER illustrated for another year at least. A prosperous and happy New Year to all the TRUTH SEEKER band.

Your steadfast friend, G. W. BALDWIN.

COHOES, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please forward me by express the bound volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER of 1888, and your ANNUAL if published. I see you contemplate discontinuing your pictures of Bible scenes. This I am sorry to see, for in my experience they do more good to the Liberal cause, and better enable the average mind to take in the situation, and hav a better effect, than all the articles in your paper together. They are excellent in showing the absurdity of the stories related in the Bible. Please send us your catalog of books.

Yours, etc., D. MCELWAIN.

HEBER CITY, Dec. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I was somewhat alarmed when I read your article concerning the pictures, and not agreeing with Mr. James Parton, I induced a young Liberal friend and neighbor of mine to subscribe for the good old paper. I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER about eleven years and I like it better and better all the time, and I would be very sorry to hav you discontinue the pictures, as I think the space they take up is well filled. Hoping you will get the number of subscribers you ask for, I remain, Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, ANDREW LINDSAY.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Dec. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me two copies of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890, five copies of Ingersoll's "Gods," and six copies of Remsburg's "Bible Morals," and place the balance of the inclosed $5 in the Free Distribution Fund.

I hav heretofore expressed my appreciation of the labors of Mr. Heston, and with all respect for the opinions of those estimable gentlemen, Mr. Parton, H. Clay Luse, and a few others, I see no good reason to change my opinion of their usefulness. With pictures or without them, I want THE TRUTH SEEKER while I liv. ALMOND OWEN.

Dec. 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER a long time, and take great interest in reading it, and in its success. As regards the pictures, I don't think they help our cause much. As for myself they are all right, but others don't look on them in the same light. My folks will not look at the paper of late, and I think the pictures are the cause. The cuts are rather rough, and might be improved without any more expense. I would like to see something that I could show to my friends and children. I am now very backward about showing them to my friends or to strangers, for I don't wish to offend any. A reader, CHAS. BORIE.

HAY SPRINGS, NEB., Dec. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: People in this new country are too poor to dictate in regard to the pictures. I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it started, and it has always suited me best of any paper in the world. I will take it either with or without pictures. I inclose a few names of Freethinkers at Rushville, Neb., that are able, and I think willing, to subscribe, if they are not now on your books.

I wish you would write to S. Stout, of Axtell, Kan., and get his statement of the Catholic trouble there and publish the same, as I am informed that it is not between Protestant Christians and Catholics. E. W. MINER.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: After reading the comments on Heston and his pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 28th, I think your friends should be divided into four classes. The first consists of a few goody-good folks who hav not been weaned from their Christian pap and cannot endure Heston's pictures in any form, and therefore want THE TRUTH SEEKER pure and straight, without any illustrations whatever. The second class consists of those who want the illustrations because they like them and therefore want them continued no matter whether they increase the circulation of the paper or not. The third class consists of very many who like Heston and enjoy his illustrations very much, and yet honestly and conscientiously believe that they do the general cause more harm than good and tend to prevent the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER among the very class it ought to reach. The fourth class is the publishers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who believe in Heston and his works and want to continue the illustrations if they can be properly compensated for the extra expense. Now, I would suggest a plan which, if adopted, I believe would harmonize and satisfy all four classes. It is this. Add to the present TRUTH SEEKER an outside cover that could be easily removed and on that cover put all the illustrations you like and such reading as may seem appropriate to the illustrations, and call that cover a supplement, and charge $4 per year for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the supplement, or $3 for the paper without the supplement. This looks to me as if it would do away with all objections from all classes and enable your friends to deal out THE TRUTH SEEKER either in mild doses or strong ones, as the case requires. Wishing you abundant success in whatever way you put it, I remain, B. REDFIELD.

PENACOOK, N. H., Dec. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, for which you will send us your ANNUAL for 1890, and use the balance for the cause. I wish it were much more. I hope to order some books later. I hav been able to get but one subscriber, but shall continue to try. As regards the pictures, when they first came out we regretted it, as we thought they might giv offense, as all our neighbors are more or less orthodox. But I am pleased to say I am heartily in their favor now, and think them very instructiv. They attract where nothing else will. Surely our great and corrupt political parties would not support cartoons did they not. I admire Heston's tact in presenting them. His last speaks volumes. If woman could but wake from her long sleep, what a revolution it would make! She will surely do so. It must come. But it "has been a long, long time on the way." Yes, we are in favor of the pictures, but however you do, will not complain, so long as we can hav the dear old TRUTH SEEKER. We must save her if we would cherish the memory of her brave founder. How dear he is to all our hearts! We still miss him and feel our great loss. All these years he has been gone from among us.

Hoping all the TRUTH SEEKER family who can will be prompt and aid you at this time, and thus place you on the footing you deserve, I am,

Sincerely thine, MRS. J. E. MARDEN.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The array of testimony in favor of continuing the illustrations of THE TRUTH SEEKER is overwhelming. They are a chapter of themselvs, more potent than words. They help reveal the absurdity, the grotesque fallacies, of Bible characters. They are more instructiv than voluminous writing. I sent over to the superintendent of our Baptist Sunday-school the copy with the cartoon of "The Glory of Predestination." I wrote on the margin, "Look on this, you superstitious frauds." On the other side were Samson and his girl. He was mad, but said he was only grieved. He lied; he was so mad he sweat and writhed. He reminded me of a sign I saw over a turning-shop. It read, "All sorts of twisting and turning done here." He was bothered for words to express his indignation. He was surprised, he said. He did not think I would insult him and the people of God so. "My dear sir," I replied, "has that not been your doctrin, and that of all orthodox creeds—infant damnation? Is not the illustration beautifully and correctly representativ of your doctrin?" He replied, "Not in the light you present it." I said, "My poor, deluded friend, can you better illustrate the truth?" He allowed I was lost, and left me still clinging to my sinful ways. Keep up the pictures. Those of the Liberals who depreciate the cartoons are shaky, and still a little fearful of Old Split-hoof, and the other fellow without horns and spear-tail. Do not let up. The last TRUTH SEEKER cartoons are sublime. The front page is prophetic. O. S. BARRETT.

CLINTON, IA., Dec. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a post-office order for $10. I hope it will be in season to do some good.

We are about to organize a society here. I find a great many folks here that seem to be ready for organization. It came about by a gentleman asking me if I did not think a Secular society could be made successful. So we hav had one preliminary, he and I, and intend to make a move early in January. My friend is not an Infidel of the same kind as myself. He seems to be a Deist, and tells me he never took much stock in orthodoxy, and never any at all in trinitarianism. And that is just where his and my early education was very much different, as I was brought up in the tight-laced, hidebound Scotch Presbyterianism. But I hav got grandly over it now. I will let you know occasionally what success we make, and shall perhaps be able to "seduce" some to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I remember that you told me last winter that I was your only subscriber here. Well, if I am, I am not the only one that reads your paper. There are many of my shopmates who are just as fond of reading it as I am, and I can pick out three or four who hav got badly bitten within the last three years. It is very pleasing to me to let them hav THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Freethought, and Twentieth Century, besides any of my books. And I hav the finest selection of good books of any I know, and keep adding from time to time. With the best wishes of the season to all, I remain,

Fraternally, JAMES A. GREENHILL.

MILFORD, MASS., Dec. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I keep no files of THE TRUTH SEEKER, feeling that more good will be accomplished by sending the papers away, and knowing that you hav had several subscribers from so doing. I utilize them a month and more by showing the pictures to friends and reading the paper also, then send the most of them to Florida. My friend sends them to New Hampshire, and they are returned to Florida again. My letters always praise the pictures. Why should anyone say that I ought to be religious? The pictures by their vivid demonstration of the effects of being religious show the absurdity of such a statement. The old Romans said of their worst enemy, "May he outliv all his friends." It was considered an awful punishment to outliv friends, but it is far preferable to being religious, when we realize its true significance. History shows plainly that religious people hav a strong penchant for preventing their enemies from outliving their friends. I hav not obtained a subscriber, but a friend gave me a dollar for the pictures, saying, "If the pictures are not continued, giv the dollar to Heston." I send one also. I cannot send you a check to pay up my subscription. It is a position to be avoided, and is not considered as a hindrance to being religious. Inclosed find check for $5.50 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER from Jan. 1, 1890, to Jan. 1, 1891, the $2 for pictures and two TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS. THE TRUTH SEEKER without the pictures would be like the play of "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out. In your search for a spirit, do not waste your time in looking through the precinct of any so-called Liberals who think that your earnest and honest call for funds dishonestly withheld was a joke. Franklin said, "If you know how to spend less than you get you hav the 'philosopher's stone.'" CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

CARTHAGE, MO., Dec. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 for F. Oswald's "Secret of the East" and "The Bible of Nature."

I am decidedly for the pictures; they do, by far, more good than our weak-kneed friends believe, who are afraid to hurt the feelings of a class of our fellow-beings who are not afraid at all to say of us publicly that we Freethinkers are lacking in morality, etc. Those excellent pictures are for us and ours and not for them, and they need not look at them if they do not like them, or if they hurt their tender and refined feeling.

Remsburg is very good, and I think a great deal of him and his work and worth, but why so much and so lengthy about Lincoln? Experience and living among the people has settled long ago the fact that a man who does not belong to a church is no Christian, whether he is an Atheist or Deist. But our present president—and that after one hundred years of political and religious liberty under a Constitution framed by Freethinkers—is a Christian in the full sense of the word—every inch a Christian. I do not say, every inch a man.

My opinion is, we must stand firm on our principles and make not the least compromise with any church. We must even avoid the appearance of a compromise. I am not in favor of admitting and welcoming men who played a conspicuous part in the Catholic church, then left it, and still hav not been severely punished by that church as renegade. I want a whole man, not half a man, and no other ought to be in our ranks than whole men.

With the best wishes for the welfare of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, A. Z.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Owing to pressing business matters I hav not sent in my warmest approval of continuing the pictures. I do most emphatically desire a continuation of the cartoons. What! to discontinue them now, after the slimy, blood-thirsting old church has just commenced to feel their deathly sting? I say no, one thousand times no. We cannot and will not submit to their displacement.

Since the noble TRUTH SEEKER came to New York city she has been a death-dealing weapon to the church, but believe me when I tell you the "house of God" never felt THE TRUTH SEEKER'S severe castigation so tremendously as she has felt it since the illustrations were brought ont, with all their telling onslaughts against the worst system of religion that ever cursed the beautiful green earth. I well know the pictures are a mightily severe rebuke against the Lord's hosts, but they are not one-tenth part as condemnatory as the wicked old harlot merits. As Mr. Bennett has truthfully said, "You cannot put it too hard when dealing with the Bible." And this old relic is the very scorpion from which the church derived her tyranny, her diabolical cursedness, her uneclipsed, downright meanness, her contemptible selfishness. I would one thousand times rather hav the smallpox, black-tongue, or yellow fever enter my house than hav this galling, sickening nightmare darken my earthly habitation. I do mean just what I say, and not for all the gold in earth would I ever again recognize her in any form whatever. In the words of John Peck, I am "on the war-path," and I carry a dirk and tomahawk and with these mustered instruments of warfare I propose to take the church's scalp clean off. Every day of my life I see so very much deception, duplicity, hypocrisy, and lack of noble manhood with Christians—well knowing it is nothing but their religion, Bible, and church that make them so, for certainly they can not possibly be so by nature—that I hav nothing but the utmost contempt for the church, Christianity, and all their affiliations. Not for one moment would I trust my life in her hands had she the power to destroy it, for the murderous old wretch once tried to crush my life out and steal my many years' hard-earned property when I was lying prostrated upon a sick-bed, not expected to liv. Oh, could the story be here fully divulged, it would make every TRUTH SEEKER subscriber cry out against the discontinuance of the pictures, and this cry coming from them would be accompanied with either a new subscriber or the corresponding cash value. Put me down at once $3 to be paid when needed to defray the burden of a continuation of the glorious illustrations. This means business. My "promis to pay" means cash. Just call for it and it will be forthcoming. You hav never yet found me a milk-and-water Liberal, but always "up and dressed" for action, to strike when needed. I am to-day supporting the Liberal cause in all directions, and hav for twelve years, when I first "gave my heart to the Lord." I hav supported three or four Liberal papers, and always paid for them in advance, too. It grieves me sadly to see occasionally in THE TRUTH SEEKER very courteous, but necessarily urgent, requests for delinquent subscribers to pay up their arrearages. It should be beneath the dignity of any Liberal worthy of the name to take a paper and not promptly pay for it. It must be this kind of milk-and-water Liberals who are afraid the pictures "will offend Christians," and would like to hav them discontinued, to which I and every other Liberal worthy the name are utterly opposed. To forego the pictures now would be a victory for the church and a disintegration on the part of Liberalism over which the church would rejoice. Let the good work go on, and let us all as good Liberals renew our efforts for the year of 1890. Liberals of all classes, "with malice toward none, with charity for all, and with firmness in the right," I wish you all a happy New Year.

L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

SHERIDAN, PA., Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As it is your desire to hav a vote from your subscribers on the picture question, and your further wish that such vote should hav a financial basis, so that it may be duly counted and recorded, I hasten to cast my ballot in favor of the cartoons, and in order that I may not be disfranchised, or hav such vote annulled by a returning board, on account of non-payment of tax, I do hereby back up the same by inclosed check for my own and five new subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER, to commence with the new year—in other words, six votes in favor of the illustrations. I entertain the opinion that the result of the vote, after being duly canvassed, will be as overwhelmingly opposed to such prohibition as it was in our state last summer on the other prohibition question of wet and dry. Some few may think that Mr. Heston's pictures carry with them a certain vulgarity that shocks the fine sensibilities of the pious believer. I dare say could, or should many of the Bible acts be portrayed in real life as they existed in ancient times, such seeming caricatures would be severely dealt with by Mr. Comstock, regardless of the vote on the subject.

As they hav been given heretofore, they are, in my opinion, rather the paintings of an optimist than those of a pessimist. They compliment rather than vulgarize. If some one would picturize the whole Bible in true pantomimic scenes, I apprehend that Mr. Wanamaker would seriously object to hav such a picture-book carried in the mails, however instructiv and entertaining it would be. Mr. Stanley may write volumes descriptiv of natural scenery in Africa; depict graphically the wild landscape and its inhabitants; yet a few photographs of such scenery and people will giv a truer and more enduring impression upon the mind than whole chapters of words. Picture-scenes you will remember long after; word-scenes are forgotten.

We were taught when young, and probably some of us hav read in the Bible, that Samson killed a lion, and we hav forgotten all about it since; but the Heston illustration of it will remain.

It would not be true to represent the ancients in full dress à-la-mode—that is, according to the prevailing fashion of our time. Neither would it be advisable to depict Isaiah and the Egyptian prisoners and captivs in the garb that the Lord commanded (Isa. xx). It cannot be denied that the Heston characters, as represented, are at least comfortably clad with the fashionable sackcloth, and in addition large, commodious shoes.

This is, indeed, more than could be said of the origina. garb of the autochthons of the garden of Eden. If he were to draw the general features, or physique, in restoration of the Neanderthal man, my Liberal friend, Mr. Parton, would possibly hav more reason to object, notwithstanding that it would even then hardly be a true representation of early man, according to science.

But enough on this picture question. In regard to the subscribers I send you, I will say, generally, that they are all good, intelligent, hard-working Liberals. They are a leaven that permeates and elevates the dough of society in which they move.

Mr. Will R. Ibach, of Newmanstown, Lebanon county, Pa., is a born Liberal, well versed in the study of astronomy—makes the astronomical calculations for nearly every alma nac in this pan-American continent, successor to L. J. Ibach now deceased. He does not recognize a catechism of portentous catastrophes or epicycles in his calculations, or believe in a Joshua's interference with the apparent motions of the sun or moon; nor in the dial of time moving backward; nor in stars falling to the earth, etc. He is a believer in the verified Newton tables rather than in the quasi Bible astronomy of Ptolemy. He is also a professional teacher, givs lessons in instrumental music; an extraordinary good violinist and a self-made man. F. G. Reed, another working Liberal "from his youth up," has a few days ago killed a fatted porker weighing eight hundred and forty-six pounds, and he challenges his brother Liberals generally, and that class who "love their enemies" particularly, to beat him. It would, in my opinion, hav taken a legion of those peculiar Gadarene spirits to fully possess this large animal, so as to put it squarely on the run.

In connection with this matter I will state that there are still some persons here who confess their belief in the demoniacal possession of the lunatic, deaf, dumb, cataleptic, insane, etc.

Nor need we be surprised when such a high divine as Henry Wace, D.D., says he does—in his controversy with T. H. Huxley on this matter last summer. Neither need we wonder at the credulity of the laity, when we read the reported explanations and apologies of Dr. Talmage on the "rib or side" question, and Jonah in the whale's mouth episode. The question arises right here: If one rib of the man—according to the Bible, or a piece of Adam's side, according to Talmage—is equal to one woman, what is the whole of the man equal to? Some theological mathematician or metaphysician of the Talmagerean persuasion Mormonized a little in his thoughts may solve this intricate problem and in the wisdom of Solomon answer: Seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines. We further conclude from the foregoing that if the word rib does not mean rib, the word "fall" does not mean "fall." And we question logically: If rib does not mean rib (Talmage) and "fall" does not mean "fall" (science), what is the value of "atonement?"

Without presuming to giv further pointers to the clergy on this last question, I will conclude these few desultory remarks by stating that I hav some prospects, in the near future, of raising more votes for the illustrations.

Yours cordially, RICHARD LECHMER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Brotherly Kindness.

meet them oft upon Broadway,
Two strong and stalwart men;
Each in his walk betraying well
The city's denizen;
Linked arm in arm they move along
Like those of kindred mind,
Bound by the tie of brotherhood;
And one of them is blind.

The other's gaze is swift and keen;
And glancing far and wide,
Whate'er he sees he quick imparts
To the brother at his side,
Who listens with an eager ear,
And questions as he goes;
While on his face the lovely light
Of cheerful patience glows.

The favored one the simple scenes
Upon the way will mark,
And paint them vividly for him
To whom the world is dark,
And beggars not himself at all,
But doubles his delight,
By sharing thus his benefits
With one deprived of sight.

In wisdom both together grow;
But he with curtained gaze
A calmer judgment, riper thought,
And firmer will betrays;
So each upon the other leans,
And kind assistance lends,
Brothers by every tie of blood,
And loving, lifelong friends.

Their heads are gray, and they hav walked
This way for years and years,
Linked arm in arm; and strangers oft
Hav gazed on them with tears;
And they hav shown throughout their lives,
As sometimes mortals can,
The meaning of true brotherhood,
The angelic side of man.

When and Where to Say "Please."

If you please, it will please me to tell your little readers, and some of the bigger ones, how to rightly use the word please.

Please is a contracted or short way of saying place at ease. To make a request prefaced with a "please" is to ask a service on the condition that the person to whom the request is preferred is pleased to grant it.

To say "please" when asking a favor of some one is usually supposed to be the polite thing to do, and many persons consider it discourteous not to, accounting the neglect as a sign that the one who asks thinks that the one asked is bound to giv.

In fact, to say, "Do me this favor, if you please," is to express a doubt on the part of the asker of the graciousness or easy disposition of the one asked, while not to speak may imply confidence in the friend's good will; therefore the word "please" had better not be used unless the ones asked may properly be supposed to understand that the asker has some reason to feel certain of their pleasure.

It is always out of order to say "please" to anyone who is under obligation to obey a requirement, as a servant or contractor, a merchant or landlord, etc., who are bargained with and paid for their labor and attention, because such persons should fulfill their orders, whether it please them to do so or not, and they must logically be supposed to be pleased to surrender what they are paid for.

JOHN P. GUILD.

A Little Girl Influenced a King.

THE ROYAL RULER OF BELGIUM GRANTS A PHILADELPHIA CHILD'S APPEAL.

In August, 1883, Frank S. Moore, of Philadelphia, a sailor on the steamer Rhineland, of the Red Star line, deserted his ship, after the captain had refused him leave of absence, for the purpose of hastening to the bedside of a dying sister. After the death of his relativ he shipped on the Waesland, of the same line, under an assumed name. Six years after his identity was disclosed by a fellow-seaman while the vessel was in Antwerp, and he was seized by the Belgian authorities and thrown into a dungeon. Since that time all the resources of diplomacy hav been exhausted in an effort to secure the man's release, but nothing availed until the latter part of June last, when Bessie Keim, a little niece of Moore, wrote this letter to the king:

TO LEOPOLD III., KING OF BELGIUM, ANTWERP, Your Majesty: I am only a little girl thirteen years old, and I hope you will pardon me for writing to you when you hear all.

My uncle, Frank S. Moore, is now in the Belgium prison for desertion from the Rhineland, over six years ago. He was sailing on the Rhineland, and my aunt was very sick. Her only prayer was to see Uncle Frank before she died. We sent word to him that she was dying. He showed the letter to the captain of the Rhineland, but he refused to let him leave the steamer. The sailors advised Uncle Frank to run away, and he did.

Aunt Debbie lived about a week afterward. After she died Uncle Frank found that his vessel had sailed, so he sailed on the Waesland under the name of Frank S. Walker. That has been over six years ago, and he was just arrested in Antwerp, as you can see by the newspaper slip that I send in my letter. Your majesty, if you had been in his place would you not hav done the same? Hoping you will pardon Uncle Frank for deserting and me for writing to you, I am,

Very respectfully, BESSIE KEIM.

Moore was released subsequent to the date of Bessie's letter, to the surprise of all of his friends, but the matter was explained when the thoughtful girl received at her home a big envelope stamped with the royal arms of Belgium. The letter was written in French, and, when translated, read as follows:

AT THE PALACE, BRUSSELS, CABINET OF THE KING.

I hav the honor of informing you that the king has read your letter and taken action upon your request therein contained, by which you solicit that he remit your uncle's imprisonment.

By his majesty's command an order to that effect has been transmitted to the minister of justice, out of compliment to his majesty's little friend. For the king.

BOMMERHEIM, Secretary.

To Mme. Bessie Keim, at Philadelphia.

The Chemistry of Leaves.

"Probably not one person in a thousand knows why leaves change their color in the fall," remarked an eminent botanist the other day. "The common and old-fashioned idea is that all this red and golden glory we see now is caused by the frosts. A true and scientific explanation of the causes of the coloring of leaves would necessitate a long and intricate discussion. Stated briefly and in proper language the causes are these: The green matter in the tissue of a leaf is composed of two colors, red and blue. When the sap ceases to flow in the fall and the natural growth of the tree ceases, oxidation of the tissue takes place. Under certain conditions the green of the leaf changes to red; under different conditions it takes on a yellow or brown tint. This difference in color is due to the difference in combination of the original constituents of the green tissue and to the varying conditions of climate, exposure, and soil. A dry, cold climate produces more brilliant foliage than one that is damp and warm. This is the reason that our American autumns are so much more gorgeous than those of England. There are several things about leaves that even science cannot explain. For instance, why one of two trees growing side by side, of the same age and having the same exposure, should take on a brilliant red in the fall, and the other should turn yellow; or why one branch of a tree should be highly colored and the rest of the tree hav only a yellow tint, are questions that it is as impossible to answer as why one member of a family should be perfectly healthy and another sickly. Maples and oaks hav the brightest colors."

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

"Now, Flossie," said the fashionable mother, "it is time for you to say your prayer." "Who shall I pray for?" "For papa and the baby and all of us." "And Fido?" "Yes, if you choose." "Mamma." "Well, dear?" "Who shall I put first? Fido or the baby?"

A little five-year-old girl came home yesterday from school, which she has only been attending a few days, and her mother asked her what she had been doing. "Writin' M's and shake awful," was the child's reply, which meant that a long course of M's in a copy-book had tried her nerves. "Well, how do you make an M?" her mother asked. "Oh, you go up a hill and down a hill, up a hill and down a hill, and stay there."

Little Johnnie: "Let's play stage robber. You come along and I'll spring out with a pistol and take away everything you've got." Little Jimmie: "But we havn't got no pistol nor nuth'n like a stage. Tell you what; when you come along I'll get you to sign a paper and then I can rob you just the same without a pistol." "All right, we'll play 'Loan Agent,' if you like it better."

I send you the following anecdote of a five-year-old youngster which you can probably incorporate in your little ones' sayings: The Sunday-school lesson was Jesus turning water in wine, the superintendent asking questions relating to the lessons. "What did Jesus do at Cana?" "Turn water into wine." "What did they then do?" "All got drunk," shouted little Barney. For once a well-filled house of godly teachers and scholars roared with laughter. The above was told me by an eye-witness and one who is a member of the church.—W. W. Welsh.

Correspondence.

HAMILTON, ONT., Dec. 21, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I take great pleasure in reading the Children's Corner, and my papa has given me "The Story Hour" as a Christmas gift. I am eight years old, and go to the public school. I am in the third grade. I hav no brother nor sister. I will close my letter. I wish you and all little Freethinkers a Happy New Year. From,

Your Liberal friend, LIZZIE PARKER.

MOLINE, ILL., Dec. 30, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I attended the Moline American Baptist church of this city the other Sunday. The preacher preached about the prodigal son. He made some very ugly remarks about Paine and Ingersoll. He compared Paine's "Age of Reason" and Ingersoll's lectures to the husks that the pigs fed on. He said that "Thomas Paine had given the 'Age of Reason' to a man. The man came to Paine at his deathbed. Paine asked him what he had done with it and he said he burnt it, whereupon Paine said, 'I wish everybody had done the same.'" He also said that Paine said, "My works are nothing but trash." I do not believe it.

I am eleven years old. My father wrote to Lennstrand, Stockholm. I will close my letter with a wish of Happy New Year to you.

JUSTA SINDGREN.

WALTHAM, MASS., Jan. 1, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and we all like the pictures, and lots of people will look at them that will not read the paper; but we think that even the pictures set them to thinking. I am thirteen years old, being born in SanFrancisco, Cal., the centennial year, and the best of all, on the 11th day of August, Robert G. Ingersoll's birthday. This makes my father and mother happy, for we all love the noble Ingersoll. I attend the public school, and my teacher is very religious and feels very bad because I don't go to church or Sunday-school; but we hope she will liv to see her mistake. We had rather drive out into the country and breathe the good fresh air on Sunday, and hear the birds sing and enjoy the beauties of nature. Hoping to see this in the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, for it is my first attempt, and wishing you all a Happy New Year, I remain, Your Freethinker friend,

CHARLES SUMNER PAGE.

AT a logging camp on the Tennessee, in Kentucky, four men, supposed drunk, were burnt in their cabin on the night of the 2d.

THE people of Sherman county, Kan., ask aid. A blizzard caught them unprepared for winter. Their houses are but shells, and their crops were often a failure.

IN the trial at Eberfeld, Germany, of ninety-one Socialists on the charge of belonging to a secret society and conspiring to disturb the peace, forty-seven were convicted.

COMMITTEES in several Western states are considering means to relieve destitute farmers in parts of North Dakota, where crops hav failed several years, and all is mortgaged.

GLADSTONE in expressing his concurrence in Andrew Carnegie's views on the duties of wealth, suggests the additional use of riches that they be given to build churches and cathedrals.

MISS LUOY WOMBLE, of Raleigh, N. C., committed suicide by shooting on the 30th ult. She had been deranged by religion, and spent a great deal of her time reading the Bible and praying.

THE catarrhal influenza called the grip is causing much illness and some deaths throughout Europe and in most cities in America. London has 10,000 cases. In New York city several thousand are ill with it, and the deaths in the city from all diseases for the twenty-four hours preceding this writing were 207, which is double the usual rate.

AT High Prairie, Kan., a revival has greatly excited the people, and crazed several. On the night of the 2d neighbors of Frank and Minnie Boland, brother and sister, found them dancing about a fire built on the floor of their house, almost nude, and singing religious songs. They refused to put out the fire, Minnie saying the Lord had made it.

THE Boston Committee of One Hundred has complained that the school board, in anxiety to avoid offending Catholics, has adopted in place of Swinton's History a work, Anderson's Manual of General History, that omits to convey proper knowledge on Catholic deeds of the past. Anderson owns that his desire to keep Catholics from parochial schools rendered him cautious to "tread very lightly over the slippery stones of ecclesiastical history."

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

BIBLE MYTHS,

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING,

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

Poetry.

A Contribution to the Celibacy Controversy.

I.

XANTIPPE.

I'd like to know if Socrates,
Before he fell upon his knees
To fair Xantippe, really knew
That she was such a horrid shrew,
Or if she forced herself to please.

Some say he left a life of ease
To school himself by her disease
To bear the worst the world could do;
I'd like to know.

For if he married her as these
Pretend, aware how she could tease,
Ought we not call him boldest too
As well as wisest? What say you?
Didn't he rival Hercules,
I'd like to know?

II.

KHADEEJA.

Mohammed loved Khadeeja well
From marriage feast to burial,
Though he was young and she was old
And he was anything but cold,
From what the true believers tell.

He made the Koran let him dwell
With many wives when death befell
This first. What charm then could she hold
Mohammed loved?

'Twas this—she felt the prophet's spell
When all the world was infidel;
She bade his failing heart be bold;
She watched while angel words were told,
And Islam lauds the sentinel
Mohammed loved.

New Publications.

Unless otherwise specified, all publications noticed here can be had of THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, at the prices named.

The interest in the North American Review for January centers in the discussion on free trade by Mr. Gladstone of England and Mr. Blaine, secretary of state for this country. The "duel," as it is called, occupies fifty-four pages, and further contributions on the same subject are promised. The remaining contents of the Review are above the average in interest.

The Society for Political Education, with headquarters at 330 Pearl street, New York, has issued a pamphlet (price 25 cents) containing "Questions for Debate in Politics and Economics. with Subjects for Essays, and Terms for Definition." Hints to writers and debaters are given, with a form of constitution and by-laws for debating clubs. The pamphlet covers the groundwork of politics and economics, and states its pressing questions with point.

The Rev. Charles Watt, Baptist minister, and Mr. Wallace Nelson, Freethought lecturer, hav been hammering each other in the columns of the Gympie Mirror, Queensland, and the Liberator Company, of Melbourne, Australia, hav reprinted the debate in tract form. The minister got the worst of it and became abusiv, whereupon Mr. Nelson closed the discussion, which was about "Creation or Evolution." Mr. Nelson is an able writer on the subject, and endeavors to make the scientific explanation of the world's growth plain to all. Price, 10 cents.

John Peck writes: "I hav received a pamphlet written by Walter Hague, entitled, 'Death Ends All.' The philosophy and statements in this pamphlet will doubtless startle many. Whether his positions are well taken is not for me to say. But my own experience makes me know beyond a doubt that some of his statements are correct. I am much interested in the pamphlet because it is to quite an extent on a line with my own thought and experience. Men of speculativ minds will be interested in the pamphlet whatever their opinions may be. And I think I will confer a favor upon most thinkers by calling attention to it. I should hav noticed it before, but hav been too busy to do so. It is published by R. Staley & Co., 315 Wood street, Pittsburgh, Pa., where I presume it may be obtained for ten or fifteen cents."

One of the most unique business calendars for 1890 is the Columbia Bicycle Calendar and Stand, issued by the Pope Mfg. Co., of Boston, Mass. It is in the form of a pad of 366 leaves, $5\frac{1}{8}$ by $2\frac{3}{4}$ inches, one for each day of the year, and one for the entire year. A good portion of each leaf is blank for memoranda. The portable stand, which holds the pad, contains pen-rack and pencil-holder. Upon each slip appear quotations pertaining to cycling and typewriting, calculated to seduce the unwary and wealthy into buying a bicycle or typewriting machine. The same company also issue a pamphlet on "Highway Improvement," being an address by Col. Albert A. Pope before the Carriage Builders' National Association at Syracuse, N. Y., last October. Mr. Pope desires better roads throughout the country so that more people can use bicycles, and consequently improve his trade. This is what the philosophers call enlightened selfishness, to which Mr. Spencer traces about all the progress of the world.

The sixteen-page and colored-covered number of the London Freethinker is full to the brim of blasphemy, both textual and pictorial. The humor of the articles is American, the style of the pictures is French. Mr. Foote and Mr. Wheeler are the leading writers, and they are helped by G. L. Mackenzie and some others who evidently prefer not to be known. The articles are, Satan and Michael, Deity Interviewed, Religious Idiots, Babyhood of Christ, Ninnies of Nineveh, Last Will of Jahveh, Barnum Outrivaled, and selected jokes. For poetry there is the Three Wise Men, Holy Young Workingmen, Good God Almighty O, In Galilee. The pictures are. An Old Christmas, A Virgin's Family, Leading Them On, Christian Godhead, Creation and Fall (twelve sketches). Holy Arson, Obeying the Bible, Samson and Sandow Eclipsed, Castles in the Air, Curious Twins, Raising the Wind. The publication can be obtained of R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter street, London, E.C., England, for 10 cents.

Mr. Arthur B. Moss announces that he will shortly issue a volume on "The Bible and Evolution." No doubt the readers of his articles on that topic which hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER will be glad to purchase the volume, which can be done for $1. The contents of the book are: Genesis and Astronomy, Genesis and Biology, Old Testament Myths, Unhistorical Character of the Old Testament, Bible Morality, Bible Miracles, Miracles Incredible, Bible Poetry, Conclusion. In a circular announcing the publication of the volume, his publishers, Messrs. Watts & Co., say: "For the past fifteen years Mr. Moss has faithfully served the Freethought cause—often 'without money and without price.' His aim has been to strengthen and consolidate the great party with which his name is identified, and to further all movements having for their object the social and moral progress of the nation. Thought of self has never influenced him, and he has neither solicited nor accepted financial assistance, all his publications being issued at his own risk. His forthcoming work is probably his most ambitious, as it is certainly his most expensiv undertaking; and his publishers venture now to invite those who appreciate Mr. Moss's labors on behalf of intellectual freedom to subscribe for a certain number of copies of his book, or to in any other way assist in its production." Orders for the volume may be sent here, and will be filled as soon as the book is received from London.

"Crime: Its Nature, Causes, Treatment, and Prevention," is the title of a substantial and well-printed volume written by Sanford M. Green, late judge of the supreme and circuit courts of Michigan, and published by the J. B. Lippincott Company of Philadelphia. The leading ideas in this book, Judge Green explains, were held and set forth by him many years ago in giving instructions to juries in the trial of criminal cases during his thirty-five years of experience on the bench. No one dissented from his view that crime is a moral disease, and that juries were like unto a council of physicians to prescribe proper treatment for the patient. These views Judge Green now expands into a series of essays in which he reinforces these views and considers the pathology of crime from all points.

The judge is one of those big-hearted, level-headed, Liberal-minded men who once in a while, and to the great surprise of the honest citizen, are found on the bench. The average judge is either a conservativ who regards a statute as a fetich, precedent as the Almighty, and common law as precedent's infallible apostle, or else he is a politician elevated to the position to serve the other politicians who put him there. Mr. Green is neither of these; he is a philosopher now that he has retired from activ duty, and what is more, he was a moralizer as well as judge when in power. His book is one of those rare productions on economics nowadays which do not advocate Socialism, or Atkinsonism, which is the philosophy of getting rich by saving pennies through economies of which the average American is utterly incapable.

In considering the nature of crime, the author of this book is not limited to what the law treats as such, but includes within the meaning of that term all wrongs committed against persons and property, public health, justice, decency, and morality. The causes of crime he finds in heredity, environment, intemperance, ignorance, idleness, avarice, cupidity, personal ambition, and a conflict between labor and capital, the result of which is injustice. His method of preventing crime is to remove the causes by education and a system of profit-sharing which shall giv to labor its just proportion of what it produces. In the mean time, until the race has advanced to that point in political economy, crime should be treated as a moral disease, and criminals placed under the care of moral doctors, who shall hold their patient in their hospital until he is cured, and not according to some determinate sentence by a judge who may be deceived into being too lenient or too severe. For young criminals especially, indeterminate sentences, with kind treatment and moral suasion and without too many iron doors and too much harsh disciplin, are advocated. The judge proceeds entirely upon humanitarian grounds, and discards the Christian idea of punishment for violating abstract authority. Treatment of criminals—the morally diseased—should be reformatory and curativ, not revengeful and sciolistic.

One of the most interesting and useful chapters of the book is that treating capital and labor, and the changed conditions in this country which hav precipitated what the economists call a conflict between them. Land monopoly he finds to be the great cause of poverty, though not at present pressing heavily upon this country. Other causes are the misuse of legislativ power, which robs one man to enrich another, and the oppressions and overbearing arrogances of the wealthy. The remedy he thinks is in education, and coöperation, affording a more just distribution of labor's products, and by which Anarchy, or Communism, or Socialism shall be avoided.

Judge Green is not a violent agitator, nor a conservativ monopolist, and his book is all the more valuable for students of social economics and social ills. The price is not given, but should not be over $2.

"The Gladstone" LAMP

is the finest lamp in the world. It gives a pure, soft, brilliant white light of 85 candle power. Purer and brighter than gas light; softer than electric light, — more cheerful than either. A Marvelous light from ordinary kerosene oil!

Seeing is Believing.

A "wonderful lamp" it is indeed. Never needs trimming, never smokes nor breaks chimneys, never "smells of the oil;" no gumming up, no leaks, no sputtering, no climbing of the flame, no annoyance of any kind, and cannot explode. And besides all these advantages it gives a clear, white light, 10 to 20 times the size and brilliancy of any ordinary house lamp! Finished in either Brass, Nickel, Gold or Antique Bronze. Also

The Gladstone Extension Study Lamp, for Clergymen, Editors, College Students, Teachers, Professors, Physicians and other professional men.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

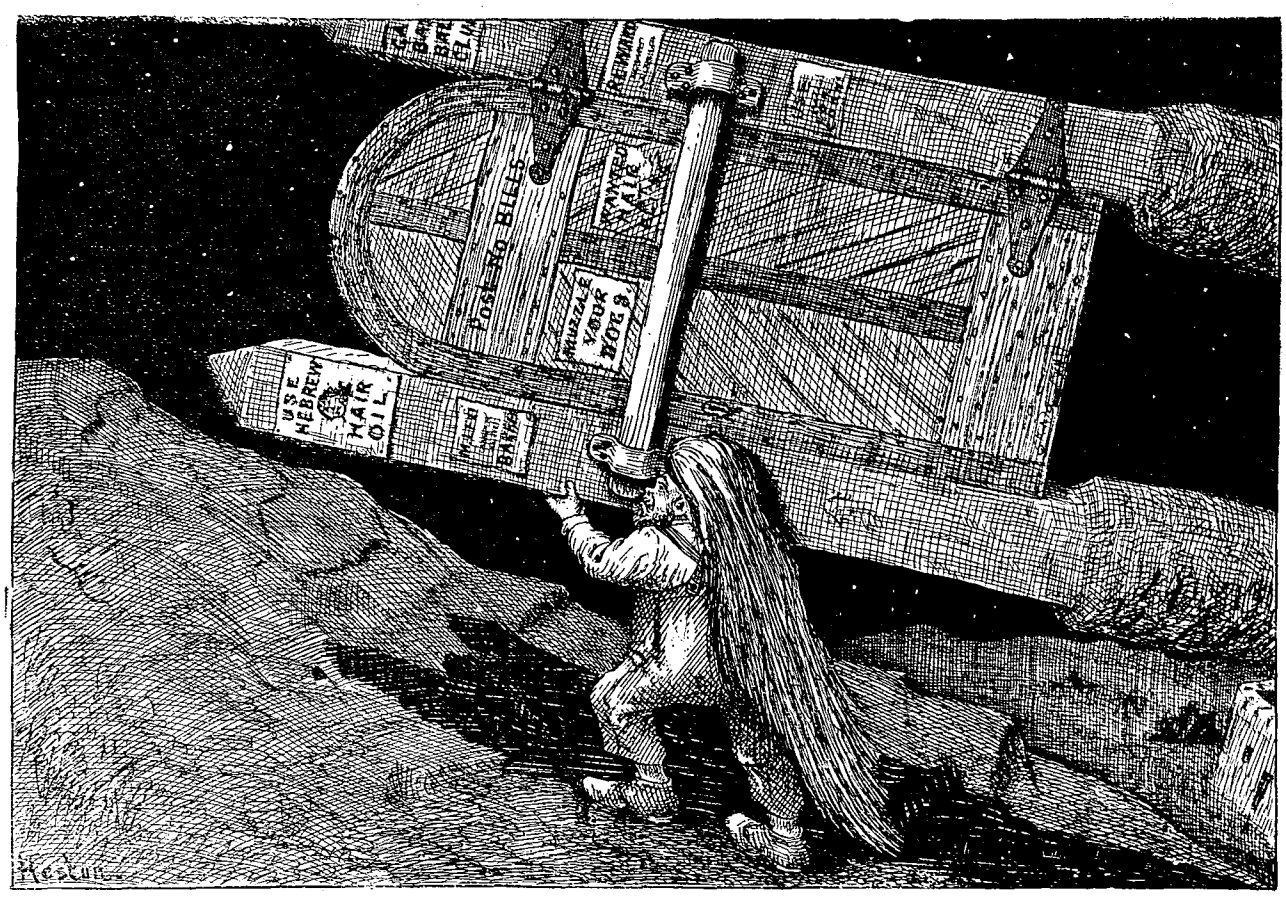
Gems of Thought.



YEAR after year we find each new attempt to stifle the expression of opinion received with an increased indignation, the sympathies of the people immediately enlisted on behalf of the oppressed teacher, and the work which is the object of condemnation elevated in public esteem often to a degree that is far greater than it deserves. Year after year the conviction becomes more general, that a provisional abnegation of the opinions of the past and a resolute and unflinching impartiality are among the highest duties of the inquirer, and that he who shrinks from such a research is at least morally bound to abstain from condemning the opinions of his neighbor.—Lecky.

WHEN armies are organized in modern civilization, the very strongest and best are selected, and the soldiers of the world are gathered from their homes in the prime of manhood and lusty health. If there is one deformed, if there is one maimed, if there is one weaker of intellect, he is left at home to continue the stock, while the strong and courageous are selected to be destroyed. In organized warfare the processes of natural selection are reversed: the fittest to liv are killed, the fittest to die are preserved; and in the grand average the weak, physically, mentally, and morally, are selected to become the propagators of the race.—J. W. Powell.

THE truest service a man can do his country is to unbias his mind, as much as possible, between the rival powers.—Swift.

THE Bible produced the church of Rome, and Torquemada was a product of the Bible. Philip of Spain and the duke of Alva were produced by the Bible.—Ingersoll.

IF men will permit themselvs to think, as rational beings ought to think, nothing can appear more ridiculous and absurd, exclusiv of all moral reflections, than to be at the expense of building navies, filling them with men, and then hauling them into the ocean, to try which can sink each other fastest. Peace, which costs nothing, is attended with infinitly more advantage than any victory with all its expense. But this, though it best answers the purpose of nations, does not that of court governments, whose habitual policy is pretense for taxation, places and offices.—Thomas Paine.

SAMSON PLAYETH A JOKE ON THE GAZITES.

And Samson lay till midnight, and arose at midnight, and took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, bar and all, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them up to the top of a hill that is before Hebron.—Judges xvi, 3.

ALL forces are correlativ—that is, they can be changed from one kind into another. For instance, heat may be converted into work, work into electricity, electricity into magnetism or light, and light may be converted back into heat, electricity, magnetism, work, etc. The same being true of all kinds of force. Hence it is claimed that as thought and will are but sublimated kinds of force, they are subject to the same principle As one of the products of life, namely heat, can in its turn be made to contribute to the support of life, so it follows that as mind can cause motion, the motion of organs of certain form and quality can reproduce mind. If the correlation of forces be true, and if mind and life are forces, other forces can, under proper circumstances, produce life and mind as readily as life and mind can produce the other forces.—C. L. Haskell.

OF all the religions that hav been produced by the egotism, the malice, the ignorance and ambition of man, Presbyterianism is the most hideous.—Ingersoll.

THE Peter's Pence for 1889 yielded to the pope $30,000 less than in 1888. The legacies bequeathed to the pope during the year amounted to $800,000.

THE Rev. Francis Byng, one of Queen Victoria's chaplains, has suddenly left London. It was thought at first that his flight was due to the Cleveland street scandal, but it now turns out that he got into debt through disastrous betting.

ACCORDING to Hoffman's, the official directory of the Roman Catholics, there are in this country 8,463 Catholic clergymen, 7,420 churches, 2,718 stations, 1,539 chapels, 202 orphan asylums, 30 theological seminaries, 125 colleges, 632 academies, 3,209 parochial schools, with an attendance of 654,838 children, and a total Roman Catholic population of 8,301,367.

I TOLD the people at Rutland, said Dr. McGlynn recently, that among the enemies of the public schools were both Protestant and Catholic clergymen. Some of the Protestant bigots want to get pretty much the whole of their religion into the public schools on the ground that there is nothing sectarian in it, against the wishes of Jews and Agnostics and Roman Catholics.

SAYS the Hebrew Journal: "To giv state grants to Catholic parochial schools means eventually to giv the same privileges to every Christian sect, to Hebrews, to Mormons, and to Atheists. This would then be but the beginning of further state recognition of separate religions. Where would it end? It would end in that religion possessing the greatest numbers eventually controling the state. This is the tendency of state-endowed parochial schools. It must be nipped in the bud or the United States will be as Jesuit ridden as Canada is now."

THE Freeman's Journal complains: "The march of intellect has caused religion to be looked upon as superstition unworthy of the consideration of the nineteenth century men, grandsons of the great revolutionists, and its practices as pusillanimous spectacles good enough to satisfy the esthetic cravings of women and children, but totally unfit to occupy the time of the esprits forts of the present work-a-day world."

THE numbers of cloisters and monks in Spain hav increased with astounding rapidity of late years. Spain now has 29,220 monks, and 25,000 nuns in 1,330 cloisters and 179 orders. In Barcelona alone there are 163 cloisters for women. In the last fourteen years the number of monks in Spain has been sextupled and the number of nuns has been doubled. This growth, if accurately reported, must inevitably lead to the confiscation of church property within a few years. Untaxed, and added to by tricking of the people into making enormous gifts, church property becomes too enormous to be allowed to remain in the hands of its owners—they practically own the whole country. This has been the experience of almost all countries.

IN his address at a consistory, December 30th, the pope referred to the Italian government as striving to detach the people from the church. He demanded the restoration of the temporal power, but not, he said, from human motivs. It was his right, and he was required to preserve it intact and transmit it to his successor as one of the inalienable treasures of the Christian faith. He alluded to the new penal code as an attack on the liberty of the clergy, and said an additional injury was about to be inflicted on the church in the passage of the bill respecting charitable trusts. This was a fresh step in the endeavor to efface every vestige of religion from civil institutions. By this law all pious establishments were to be suppressed or transferred, especially those for the dowering of girls without portions, those regarding girls entering convents, and those by which it was provided that masses should be said for the souls of the dead. Priests were excluded from the benefits of charitable institutions, and women were admitted to such benefits.

THE Sabbatarians all over the country are activ. In Philadelphia they are moving to close the cigar stores on Sunday, and Wanamaker's tool in the post-office, Mr. Field, has discontinued several Sunday collections of the mail. In Atlanta, Ga., they are endeavoring to close "sacred" concerts. In Cleveland, O., their crusade is against about everything. In Newark, N. J., and Omaha, Neb., the saloons are the object of attack. In Minneapolis it is the theaters, and in Denver, Col., it is stores in general. The Sabbath Union publishes this call to the faithful: "Let the friends of law and order everywhere stand firm. The most desperate attempts are being made by the enemies of the Sabbath to obstruct legislation, and thus to make odious all measures adopted to protect the day against lawlessness." In Chicago, the fanatics are also hard at work, but are opposed by the Personal Rights League, which is preparing to make an activ campaign in opposition to Sunday closing in that city. Ward clubs will be formed with this purpose in view, and their efforts will probably culminate next spring in the endeavor to elect candidates who will nullify the Sunday closing ordinances of Chicago.

THE latest news from the communistic colony of Topolobampo, in Sinaloa, Mex., is given by C. C. Remley, who has returned to San Francisco. He was induced to join the colony by representations of the ideal life which was to be enjoyed at Topolobampo. Remley joined a party from Kansas City last year, and took his family, and supplies sufficient for a two years' stay. He remain four months, leaving last November. He says the colonists now number about one hundred and ten, mostly old men and women who hav become so embittered by their disappointment that they are hard to liv with. If these people had means to leave there would not be twenty remaining at the place, but having put their money in the general fund, they can get nothing back. All are paid for work in time checks, which cannot be cashed, because the directors say there are no funds. Remley says some of the land owned by the colony is good, but the colonists persist in planting eastern seed, and they hav thus regularly lost their crops. The regular diet of the colonists is black-eyed beans and corn bread three times a day, and most of them are too poor to buy any meat. He pronounced most of the statements in the Credit Foncier, the official newspaper organ, to be falsehoods, as the colony has nothing to offer to new members but hard work and poor food.

Letters on the Land Question.

BY HERBERT SPENCER, FREDERICK GREENWOOD, PROFESSOR HUXLEY, SIR LOUIS MALLET, AND JOHN LAIDLER.

The following letters, reprinted from the London Times of recent date (Nov. 7—15, 1889), are of great interest, says the editor of the Popular Science Monthly, on account of the light they throw upon some of the more important aspects of the question of land nationalization, and on the problems of Socialism in general.

MR. SPENCER'S FIRST LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES, Sir: During the interview between Mr. Morley and some of his constituents, reported in your issue of the 5th inst., I was referred to as having set forth certain opinions respecting land-ownership.* Fearing that, if I remain silent, many will suppose I hav said things which I hav not said, I find it needful to say something in explanation.

Already within these few years I hav twice pointed out that these opinions (made to appear by those who hav circulated them widely different from what they really are, by the omission of accompanying opinions) were set forth in my first work, published forty years ago; and that, for the last twelve or fifteen years, I hav refrained from issuing new editions of that work and hav interdicted translations, because, though I still adhere to its general principles, I dissent from some of the deductions.

The work referred to—"Social Statics"—was intended to be a system of political ethics—absolute political ethics, or that which ought to be, as distinguished from relativ political ethics, or that which is at present the nearest practicable approach to it. The conclusion reached concerning land-ownership was reached while seeking for a valid basis for the right of property: the basis assigned by Locke appearing to me invalid. It was argued that a satisfactory ethical warrant for private ownership could arise only by contract between the community, as original owner of the inhabited area, and individual members, who became tenants, agreeing to pay certain portions of the produce, or its equivalent in money, in consideration of recognized claims to the rest. And in the course of the argument it was pointed out that such a view of land-ownership is congruous with existing legal theory and practice; since in law every landowner is held to be a tenant of the Crown—that is, of the community, and since, in practice, the supreme right of the community is asserted by every act of Parliament which, with a view to public advantage, directly or by proxy takes possession of land after making due compensation.

All this was said in the belief that the questions raised were not likely to come to the front in our time or for many generations; but, assuming that they would some time come to the front, it was said that, supposing the community should assert overtly the supreme right which is now tacitly asserted, the business of compensation of land-owners would be a complicated one:

> One that perhaps cannot be settled in a strictly equitable manner. . . . Most of our present land-owners are men who hav, either mediately or immediately, either by their own acts or by the acts of their ancestors, given for their estates equivalents of honestly earned wealth, believing that they were investing their savings in a legitimate manner. To justly estimate and liquidate the claims of such is one of the most intricate problems society will one day hav to solve.

To make the position I then took quite clear, it is needful to add that, as shown in a succeeding chapter, the insistence on this doctrin, in virtue of which "the right of property obtains a legitimate foundation," had for one of its motivs the exclusion of Socialism and Communism, to which I was then as profoundly averse as I am now.

Investigations made during recent years into the various forms of social organization, while writing the "Principles of Sociology," hav in part confirmed and in part changed the views published in 1850. Perhaps I may be allowed space for quoting from "Political Institutions" a paragraph showing the revised conclusions arrived at:

> At first sight it seems fairly inferable that the absolute ownership of land by private persons must be the ultimate state which industrialism brings about. But though industrialism has thus far tended to individualize possession of land while individualizing all other possession, it may be doubted whether the final stage is at present reached. Ownership established by force does not stand on the same footing as ownership established by contract; and though multiplied sales and purchases, treating the two ownerships in the same way, hav tacitly assimilated them, the assimilation may eventually be denied. The analogy furnished by assumed rights of possession over human beings helps us to recognize this possibility. For, while prisoners of war, taken by force and held as property in a vague way (being at first much on a footing with other members of a household), were reduced more definitly to the form of property when the buying and selling of slaves became general; and, while it might centuries ago hav been thence inferred that the ownership of man by man was an ownership in course of being permanently established, yet we see that a later stage of civilization, reversing this process, has destroyed ownership of man by man. Similarly, at a stage still more advanced, it may be that private ownership of land will disappear. As that primitiv freedom of the individual which existed before war established coerciv institutions and personal slavery comes to be reëstablished as militancy declines, so it seems possible that the primitiv ownership of land by the community, which, with the development of coerciv institutions, lapsed in large measure or wholly into private ownership, will be revived as industrialism further develops. The régime of contract, at present so far extended that the right of property in movables is recognized only as having arisen by exchange of services or products under agreements, or by gift from those who had acquired it under such agreements, may be further extended so far that the products of the soil will be recognized as property only by virtue of agreements between individuals as tenants and the community as landowner. Even now, among ourselvs, private ownership of land is not absolute. In legal theory land-owners are directly or indirectly tenants of the crown (which in our day is equivalent to the state, or, in other words, the community); and the community from time to time resumes possession after making due compensation. Perhaps the right of the community to the land, thus tacitly asserted, will in time to come be overtly asserted and acted upon after making full allowance for the accumulated value artificially given. . . . There is reason to suspect that, while private possession of things produced by labor will grow even more definit and sacred than at present, the inhabited area, which cannot be produced by labor, will eventually be distinguished as something which may not be privately possessed. As the individual, primitivly owner of himself, partially or wholly loses ownership of himself during the militant régime, but gradually resumes it as the industrial régime develops, so possibly the communal proprietorship of land, partially or wholly merged in the ownership of dominant men during evolution of the militant type, will be resumed as the industrial type becomes fully evolved (pp. 643–646).

The use of the words "possible," "possibly," and "perhaps" in the above extracts shows that I hav no positiv opinion as to what may hereafter take place. The reason for this state of hesitancy is that I can not see my way toward reconciliation of the ethical requirements with the politico-economical requirements. On the one hand, a condition of things under which the owner of, say, the Scilly Isles might make tenancy of his land conditional upon professing a certain creed or adopting prescribed habits of life, giving notice to quit to any who did not submit, is ethically indefensible. On the other hand, "nationalization of the land," effected after compensation for the artificial value given by cultivation, amounting to the greater part of its value, would entail, in the shape of interest on the required purchase-money, as great a sum as is now paid in rent, and indeed a greater, considering the respectiv rates of interest on landed property and other property. Add to which, there is no reason to think that the substituted form of administration would be better than the existing form of administration. The belief that land would be better managed by public officials than it is by private owners is a very wild belief.

What the remote future may bring forth there is no saying; but with a humanity anything like that we now know, the implied reorganization would be disastrous. I am, etc., HERBERT SPENCER.

MR. GREENWOOD'S LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES, Sir: Mr. Herbert Spencer's letter in the Times of to-day carries with it a heavy lesson to political philosophers. They are taught to remember that this is an age of popular education, as well as of social unrest; that their books are read not only by students like themselvs, who often find their chief interest in a display of intellectual subtlety or athleticism, but by thousands of men who are ever on the alert for warranted theories of social reform that will better their condition. And if such theories should happen to be ill-considered before publication, or unaccompanied by a strong and clear recital of whatever reasons are fatal to their application in this work-a-day world, the mischief they may do is enormous. How clearly Mr. Spencer must see this now. And how sorry he must be for having so terribly misled, not Mr. Laidler and the Labor party of Newcastle alone—that is not imaginable—but many other poor men also who habitually hang on the authority of great men like himself.

It was when Mr. Morley was so delicately heckled at Newcastle that a member of the Labor party deputation asked him what he thought about the nationalization of the land. Mr. Morley demurred. Mr. Laidler said the Labor party had its own plan. "They remembered that Mr. Herbert Spencer had said that the land had been taken by force and fraud; that gentleman had also said that to right one wrong it takes another." "Why," replies Mr. Morley, "has he said this?" "We all know he has," rejoins Mr. Laidler. "But you are aware that he has recalled some of the things he has laid down?" "Yes," rejoins Mr. Laidler; "but if he has stated truth and recalled it the truth will prevail." There we are. This little bit of conversation is precious beyond many pages of "absolute political ethics," judged by the standard of usefulness; and it will be useful to nobody so much as to writers like Mr. Herbert Spencer.

For what has he to say to it all? He says that the opinions quoted by Mr. Laidler were set forth forty years ago in a work "intended to be a system of absolute political ethics; or that which ought to be, as distinguished from relativ political ethics, or that which is at present the nearest practical approach to it." These opinions were accompanied by others which forbid the interpretation sometimes put upon them. But yet, on reflection, they satisfied Mr. Spencer so little, he thought them so little guarded or corrected by those other opinions of his, that for the last fifteen years he has not allowed the book that contained them to appear in any language. "Though I still adhere to its general principles, I dissent from some of the deductions"—those, perhaps, which Mr. Laidler regards as truth once uttered and never to be recalled. Besides, what Mr. Spencer said on this subject "was said in the belief that the questions raised were not likely to come to the front in our time or for many generations;" and it did include the statement that, if the community took the land, the necessary business of compensation would be a complicated one. "To justly estimate and liquidate the claims" of our present landowners "is one of the most intricate problems society one day will hav to solve." Since "Social Statics" was published, however, Mr. Spencer has come to revised conclusions; and these he now sets forth in the Times. Permit me to quote a few sentences from this statement:

> Though industrialism has thus far tended to individualize possession of land, while individualizing all other possessions, it may be doubted whether the final stage is at present reached. Ownership established by force does not stand on the same footing as ownership established by contract; and though multiplied sales and purchases treating the two ownerships in the same way hav tacitly assimilated them, the assimilation may eventually be denied. . . . There is reason to suspect that, while private possession of things produced by labor will grow even more definit and sacred than at present, the inhabited area, which cannot be produced by labor, will eventually be distinguished as something which may not be privately possessed. . . . Possibly the communal proprietorship of land, partially or wholly merged in the ownership of dominant men during evolution of the militant type, will be resumed as the industrial type becomes fully evolved.

After quoting these and similar passages from his revised opinions, Mr. Spencer makes the following observations: "The use of the words 'possible,' 'possibly,' and 'perhaps,' in the above extracts shows that I hav no positiv opinion as to what may hereafter take place." But of this Mr. Spencer feels sure: Nationalize the land on righteous principles of compensation, and the interest on the purchase money would exceed the sum now paid in rent. Moreover, it is a "wild belief" that the land would be better managed—i. e., more profitably managed—by public officials than by private owners. "With a humanity anything like that we now know, the implied reorganization would be disastrous."

Well, we hav only to do with the humanity that we now know; and being what it is, surely Mr. Spencer should hav taken pains from the beginning to consider its manifold weaknesses and temptations. Yet still he repeats that the individual ownership of land was established by force, the assertion that Mr. Laidler and the Labor party of Newcastle stand upon. While, as for his perhapses and possiblies, they are in fact expressions of doubt as to whether the community will or will not resume ownership of the land, but they are not necessarily to be taken in that sense, and any Mr. Laidler might be forgiven if he saw in them a suggestion of the right thing to do, or a prophecy the fulfillment of which it would not be wrong to precipitate. All the more reasonably might he think so when he sees that in these same revised conclusions Mr. Spencer likens the acquisition of property in land by individuals to the old-time "ownership of man by man." "The ownership of land was established by force;" it originated in robbery; at the root it is robbery still. That is the point for Mr. Laidler; and, writing for humanity as we know it, and as the next generation is likely to know it, it is a pity that Mr. Spencer did not guard at once and in the strongest way against the probable use that humanity, as we know it, would make of the assertion. The possible resumption of the land by some totally different generation of humanity, one that we know not of, should not hav been committed to print as the righting of a wrong, without

Extract from the Morley Interview.* Mr. Laidler said their method of dealing with the land would be that the present owners should hold it for their time, and that it should revert back to the state. They remembered that Mr. Herbert Spencer had said that the land had been taken by force and by fraud. That gentleman had also said that to right one wrong it takes another.

Mr. Morley.—Has Mr. Spencer said this?

Mr. Laidler.—Yes; we all know.

Mr. Morley.—You are aware that he has recalled some of the things he has laid down?

Mr. Laidler.—If he has stated truth and recalled it, the truth will prevail.

Mr. Morley.—Do you include houses?

Mr. Laidler.—We include land, not houses. In houses there is labor, but in land there is not.

Mr. Morley.—Not?

Mr. Laidler.—There may be labor exerted in land, but as far as the labor is in the land we believe it ought to belong to the laborer. As the land has been obtained by the method I hav named—by force and fraud, as Spencer says—we contend that the land ought to be taken back by the community and handed over to the municipalities and county councils to be sued in such democratic manner as the people may elect those bodies for.

Mr. Morley.—I cannot think that what is commonly called nationalization of the land is anything but what it was called the other day—either robbery or folly. I hav really no more to say on that subject.

the clearest warning that, till that generation comes, land nationalization must be an exceeding great folly, amounting to absolute disaster. For the good of humanity, that was always the most important point to insist upon. It is to be feared that some thousands of Laidlers will not think so much of it now. So much does it become political philosophers to be careful. Some medicins are also poisons; such medicins should never be issued over the counter to any and every purchaser without a warning label; and this I hope I may say without seeming disrespect for Mr. Herbert Spencer.

Your obedient servant, FRYDERICK GREENWOOD.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY'S LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES Sir: I hav read with very great interest the "heckling" of Mr. Morley, the letters of Mr. Spencer and of Mr. Greenwood, and your editorial comments on this triangular duel. But, if I may speak in the name of that not inconsiderable number of persons to whom absolute ethics and a priori politics are alike stumbling-blocks, permit me, borrowing a phrase which a learned judge has immortalized, to say that "You hav not helped us much."

Let me explain the nature of the further help we require by putting a case which is not altogether imaginary:

A score of years ago A. B. bought a piece of land; he paid the price asked by the vender, and all the conditions required by the law were fulfilled in the transference of ownership. The transaction was as much a free contract as if A. B. had gone to market and bought a cabbage. At the time that A. B. handed over his money he believed that the state was a copartner in the contract, in so far that it undertook to maintain his rights of ownership against everything and everybody who should attempt to invade them, except an act of the legislature, or the orders of the commanding officer in war time, or a police officer legally authorized. A. B. has gone on paying his taxes to the state all these years, in the full conviction that the state contracted, among other things, to afford him the protection thus defined.

A. B.'s lawyers assured him that the title to the land was perfectly good. This means that, for several centuries at least, neither force nor fraud has intervened, but that the land has passed from owner to owner by free contract. At the same time, A. B., who is somewhat pedantic in the matter of historical accuracy, admits that, for anything he knows to the contrary, in the reign of King John his bit of land may hav belonged to Cedric the Saxon; and that possibly the son of that worthy thane, after the quarrel with Rowena, related by a historian of later date than Scott, may hav taken forcible possession of it, and, in virtue of his favor at court, kept it for himself and his descendants.

Now, my friends and myself, having no better guides than common morality and common sense, are of opinion that, supposing Ivanhoe to hav behaved in this scandalous fashion, the fact makes not the smallest difference in justice or in equity to the title of A. B.; and that, if it did, the state, which has contracted to defend A. B.'s title without the least reference to such antiquarian contingencies, would commit a gross fraud if it broke its contract on any such flimsy pretenses.

The right to compensation is not in question; what we deny is the right to disturb A. B. on such a ground.

It would appear, however, that there is some better guidance than that of common morality and common sense; "absolute political ethics" is an infallible indicator of what we ought to do—whether the action indicated is possible or impossible.

Now, what we want is this very light as to what we ought to do in such a concrete case as that I hav mentioned. The dictum that "ownership established by force does not stand on the same footing as ownership established by contract," I must repeat "does not help us." Construed strictly, it is a mere truism; construed broadly, it may cover Mr. Laidler's view.

What we want to know is this: According to "absolute political ethics," has A. B. a moral as well as a legal right to his land or not?

If he has not, how does "absolute political ethics" deduce his title to compensation? And, if he has, how does "absolute political ethics" deduce the state's right to disturb him?

No question is raised here as to the right of the state to deal with A. B.'s land or anything else he possesses on grounds of public utility or necessity; nor do we want to know what may be done by the wisdom or the folly of future generations. "Absolute political ethics" should be independent of time and space; and it ought to be able to tell us whether, in foro conscientiæ, A. B., if he continue to hold his land under the circumstances supposed, is an honest man or a receiver of stolen goods.

I intervene in this discussion most unwillingly, but I hav long been of opinion that the great political evil of our time is the attempt to sanction popular acts of injustice by antiquarian and speculativ arguments.

My friend Mr. Spencer is, I am sure, the last person willingly to abet this tendency. But I am afraid that, in spite of all Mr. Spencer's disclaimers, the next time Mr. Morley visits his constituents his pertinacious "heckler" will insist that, after all, the younger and the older philosopher are not disagreed in principle; and that the difference of "footing" between ownership primarily based on force and other ownership cannot be cured by efflux of time, and justifies the state now, or at any future period, in dealing differently with the two.

In Ireland confiscation is justified by the appeal to wrongs inflicted a century ago; in England the theorems of "absolute political ethics" are in danger of being employed to make this generation of landowners responsible for the misdeeds of William the Conqueror and his followers.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
T. H. HUXLEY.

SIR L. MALLET'S LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES, Sir: Mr. Frederick Greenwood's letter, and the leading article in the Times of to day, on Mr. Herbert Spencer's recent letter upon this subject, leave little more to be said on several aspects of the question, but there are one or two points upon which I should be glad of an opportunity of adding a few remarks.

The passage in the "Political Institutions" quoted by Mr. Herbert Spencer has been long familiar to the students of his writings, and to some of them, who, like myself, are among his sincere admirers, has always been a subject of surprise and regret.

The whole extract should be read, but to save your space I confine myself to the concluding sentences, which are enough for my purpose:

There is reason to suspect that while private possession of things produced by labor will grow even more definit and sacred than at present, the inhabited area, which cannot be produced by labor, will eventually be distinguished as something which may not be privately possessed. As the individual, primitivly owner of himself, partially or wholly loses ownership of himself during the militant régime, but gradually resumes it as the industrial régime develops; so, possibly, the communal proprietorship of land, partially or wholly merged in the ownership of dominant men during evolution of the militant type, will be resumed as the industrial type becomes fully evolved.

The analogy here suggested between the ownership of man by other men, or slavery, and the private ownership of land, with the inference drawn from it, that as the first has been abolished in civilized countries the second may possibly share its fate, has always appeared to me essentially fallacious.

The principle of private property, so far as the term is applicable to human beings, has not in their case been abolished—on the contrary, it has been signally vindicated.

The destruction of slavery asserted the right of every man to property in himself, while prohibiting the ownership of man by other men, both individually and collectivly. It was the restitution of a right of property from a wrongful to a rightful owner. In order to render Mr. Spencer's analogy applicable, it seems to me that the right of ownership in one man by another, instead of being abolished altogether, should hav been transferred, as it is proposed to do in the case of land, from the individual to the state.

But, however this may be, it seems clear that the principle which includes the ownership of one man by another, rests upon the same grounds as that which includes private property in land, viz., that the general interests of society are best promoted by personal freedom.

There seems to be sufficient evidence that compulsory labor is less productiv than free labor, and if this is so we may conclude, even setting aside all considerations of humanity or morality, that the interests of society are better promoted by free labor or property in one's self, than by slavery or property in others.

This is usually admitted, but it is necessary to insist upon what is always forgotten by those who declaim against private property in land—that this last institution also is an essential condition of personal freedom, as by no other means short of coercion can a due relation be maintained between demand and supply.

Whoever holds the land holds that which, being limited in extent (the only assumption on which the question arises), imposes on its possessor the function and duty, which he is bound in the interest of society, no less than his own, to perform, of restricting an undue pressure on the soil, whether for agricultural or urban purposes, whether for food or shelter, by the increasing wants of the population.

If the family is the economic unit, this object may be effected by the exercise of the personal responsibility and authority of its head in regulating supply, and by a gradual augmentation of price and rent in restraining demand. When the limits of production or supply are reached, any additional population must migrate or be supported, if possible, by charity.

But whenever the economic unit is extended so as to include a whole community, this personal responsibility, and with it personal liberty, disappears. In a small district (a village or canton) where the conditions approximate to family or patriarchal life the evil is mitigated; but in a large and complex society, to vest the property of the soil in the state, i.e., in a central government, removed, as it must be, from all personal contact with individuals—is to throw upon it the paramount obligation of either regulating the increase of population or of providing food and shelter for increasing numbers by progressiv inroads upon the accumulated capital of the country—in short, upon the net product, which is the only source of a progressiv civilization. The first of these alternativs cannot be better described than in the words of Bastiat:

Ce serait créer le plus faillible, le plus universel, le plus immédiat, le plus inquisitorial, le plus insupportable, et disons, fort heureusement, le plus impossible, de tous les despotismes que jamais cervelle de pacha ou de mufti ait pu consevoir.*

The second course could only lead to the gradual pauperization and ultimate bankruptcy of any country which had the folly to embark in it. Such an experiment would be only comparable to that of a vast joint-stock company in which all comers were entitled to shares without paying for them.

The distinction drawn by Mr. Herbert Spencer, in common with the late Mr. Mill, between private property in land and private property in things produced by labor, is one which I believe to hav no economic justification whatever. It ignores the fundamental principle on which the institution of private property is grounded—viz., that a due relation between demand and supply can be maintained in no other way consistently with personal freedom.

From this point of view the fact that the supply of land is practically limited, and that it is, therefore, a natural monopoly, renders it not less but more necessary that it should be allowed to be the subject of private appropriation.

Sir Henry Maine has summed up the whole question in a few words, which cannot be too often repeated.

There are two sets of motivs, and two only, by which the great bulk of the materials of human subsistence and comfort hav hitherto been produced and reproduced. One has led to the cultivation of the Northern states of the American Union from the Atlantic to the Pacific; the other had a considerable share in bringing about the agricultural and industrial progress of the Southern states, and in old days it produced the wonderful prosperity of Peru under the Incas. One system is economical competition, the other consists in the daily task, perhaps fairly and kindly allotted, but enforced by the prison or the scourge. So far as we hav any experience to teach us, we are driven to the conclusion that every society of men must adopt one system or the other, or it will pass through penury to starvation (Popular Government).

I hav the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant, LOUIS MALLET.

MR. SPENCER'S SECOND LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES, Sir: As Professor Huxley admits that his friend A. B.'s title to his plot of land is qualified by the right of the state to dispossess him if it sees well—as, by implication, he admits that all landowners hold their land subject to the supreme ownership of the state, that is, the community—as he contends that any force or fraud by which land was taken in early days does not affect the titles of existing owners, and a fortiori does not affect the superior title of the community—and as, consequently, he admits that the community, as supreme owner with a still valid title, may resume possession if it thinks well, he seems to me to leave the question standing very much where it stood; and since he, as I suppose, agrees with me that any such resumption, should a misjudgment lead to it, ought to be accompanied by due compensation for all artificial value given to land, I do not see in what respect we disagree on the land question. I pass, therefore, to his comments on absolute political ethics.

"Your treatment is quite at variance with physiological principles," would probably be the criticism passed by a modern practitioner on the doings of a Sangrado, if we suppose one to hav survived. "Oh, bother your physiological principles," might be the reply. "I hav got to cure this disease, and my experience tells me that bleeding and frequent draughts of hot water are needed." "Well," would be the rejoinder, "if you do not kill your patient, you will at any rate greatly retard his recovery, as you would probably be aware had you read Professor Huxley's 'Lessons on Elementary Physiology,' and the more elaborate books on the subject which medical students hav to master."

This imaginary conversation will sufficiently suggest that, before there can be rational treatment of a disordered state of the bodily functions, there must be a conception of what constitutes their ordered state: knowing what is abnormal implies knowing what is normal. That Prof. Huxley recognizes this truth is, I suppose, proved by the inclusion of physiology in that course of medical education which he advocates. If he says that abandonment of the Sangrado treatment was due, not to the teachings of physiology, but to knowledge empirically gained, then I reply that if he expands this statement so as to cover all improvements in medical treatment he suicidally rejects the teaching of physiological principles as useless.

*It would be to create the most fallible, the most universal, the most autocratic, the most inquisitorial, the most insupportable, and let us say—very happily—the most impossible of all despotisms that ever brain of pacha or of mufti may hav conceived.

Without insisting upon that analogy between a society and an organism which results from the interdependence of parts performing different functions—though I believe he recognizes this—I think he will admit that conception of a social state as disordered implies conception of an ordered social state. We may fairly assume that, in these modern days at least, all legislation aims at a better; and the conception of a better is not possible without conception of a best. If there is rejoicing because certain diseases hav been diminished by precautions enforced, the implied ideal is a state in which these diseases hav been extinguished. If particular measures are applauded because they hav decreased criminality, the implication is that the absence of all crime is a desideratum. Hence, however much a politician may pooh-pooh social ideals, he cannot take steps toward bettering the social state without tacitly entertaining them. And though he may regard absolute political ethics as an airy vision, he makes bit by bit reference to it in everything he does. I simply differ from him in contending for a consistent and avowed reference, instead of an inconsistent and unacknowledged reference.

Even without any such strain on the imagination as may be required to conceive a community consisting entirely of honest and honorable men—even without asking whether there is not a set of definit limits to individual actions which such men would severally insist upon and respect—even without asserting that these limits must, in the nature of things, result when men hav severally to carry on their lives in proximity with one another, I should hav thought it sufficiently clear that our system of justice, by interdicting murder, assault, theft, libel, etc., recognizes the existence of such limits and the necessity for maintaining them; and I should hav thought it manifest enough that there must exist an elaborate system of limits or restraints on conduct, by conformity to which citizens may coöperate without dissension. Such a system, deduced as it may be from the primary conditions to be fulfilled, is what I mean by absolute political ethics. The complaint of Professor Huxley that absolute political ethics does not show us what to do in each concrete case seems to be much like the complaint of a medical practitioner who should speak slightingly of physiological generalizations because they did not tell him the right dressing for a wound or how best to deal with varicose veins. I cannot here explain further, but any one who does not understand me may find the matter discussed at length in a chapter on "Absolute and Relativ Ethics" contained in the "Data of Ethics."

It appears to me somewhat anomalous that Professor Huxley, who is not simply a biologist but is familiar with science at large, and who must recognize the reign of law on every hand, should tacitly assume that there exists one group of lawless phenomena—social phenomena. For if they are not lawless—if there are any natural laws traceable throughout them, then our aim should be to ascertain these and conform with them, well knowing that non-conformity will inevitably bring penalties. Not taking this view, however, it would seem as though Professor Huxley agrees with the mass of "practical" politicians, who think that every legislativ measure is to be decided by estimation of probabilities unguided by a priori conclusions. Well, had they habitually succeeded, one might not wonder that they should habitually ridicule abstract principles; but the astounding accumulation of failures might hav been expected to cause less confidence in empirical methods. Of the 18,110 public acts passed between 20 Henry III. and the end of 1872, Mr. Janson, vice-president of the Law Society, estimates that four-fifths hav been wholly or partially repealed, and that in the years 1870–1872 there were repealed 3,532 acts, of which 2,759 were totally repealed. Further, I myself found, on examining the books for 1881–1883, that in those years there had been repealed 650 acts belonging to the present reign, besides many of preceding reigns. Remembering that acts which are repealed hav been doing mischief, which means loss, trouble, pain to great numbers—remembering, thus, the enormous amount of suffering which this helter-skelter legislation has inflicted for generations and for centuries, I think it would not be amiss to ask whether better guidance may not be had, even though it should come from absolute political ethics.

I regret that neither space nor health will permit me to discuss any of the questions raised by Sir Louis Mallet. And here, indeed, I find myself compelled to desist altogether. In so far as I am concerned, the controversy must end with this letter. I am, etc., HERBERT SPENCER.

MR. LAIDLER'S LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES, Sir: As one of the deputation of members of the Newcastle Labor Electoral Organization who recently waited upon Mr. John Morley, M.P., to ascertain his opinions on certain political and social topics, I was intrusted by my fellow-members of the delegation with the question of the nationalization of the land, and this subject I discussed with Mr. Morley. In doing so, I sought to back up my position by quoting the ninth chapter of "Social Statics," by Mr. Herbert Spencer, and I certainly thought I had a good case when I found on my side the most distinguished authority of our time. To my great surprise I now find that in the letters which he has addressed to you, Mr. Herbert Spencer appears to be very anxious to repudiate the doctrins which he preached so eloquently in 1850. Now, although it is a common thing for the politician of to-day to repudiate principles and deductions which he formerly warmly espoused and to adopt others which he once energetically condemned, one does not expect the same vacillation on the part of a distinguished philosopher like Mr. Herbert Spencer. I find it difficult to understand his position, which seems to be this—that while adhering to his general principles he abandons certain deductions therefrom. Now, to my mind, the ninth chapter of "Social Statics" which deals with "The right to the use of the earth," seems as true, as logical, and as unanswerable an argument in favor of the nationalization of the land as it doubtless appeared to Mr. Spencer on the day it was written. Let us trace the course of his argument through the ten sections of which the chapter is composed:

1. Given a race of beings having like claims to pursue the objects of their desires, and a world into which such beings are similarly born, it unavoidably follows that they hav equal rights to the use of this world. Conversely, it is manifest that no one, or part of them, may use the earth in such a way as to prevent the rest from similarly using it.

2. Equity, therefore, does not permit property in land. Otherwise, landless men might equitably be expelled from the earth altogether.

3. We find yet further reason to deny the rectitude of property in land. Violence, fraud, the prerogativ of force, the claims of superior cunning, these are the sources to which titles may be traced. Could valid claims thus be constituted? Hardly. If not, what becomes of the pretensions of all subsequent holders of estates so obtained?

4. Not only hav present land tenures an indefensible origin, but it is impossible to discover any mode in which land can become private property. Cultivation cannot giv a legitimate title.

5. Why not agree to a fair subdivision of the land? Until we can demonstrate that men born after a certain date should be doomed to slavery, we must consider no such allotment permissible.

6. Either men hav a right to make the soil private property or they hav not. No compromise is possible. If they hav such a right, then the duke of Sutherland may justifiably banish Highlanders to make room for sheep-walks.

7. After all, nobody does implicitly believe in landlordism. If a canal, a railway, or a turnpike road is to be made, we do not scruple to seize just as many acres as may be requisit. If we decide that the claims of individual ownership must giv way, then we imply that the right of the nation at large to the soil is supreme.

8. To what does this doctrin, that men are equally entitled to the use of the earth, lead? Instead of being in the possession of individuals, the country would be held by the great corporate body—society. Instead of leasing his acres from an isolated proprietor, the farmer would lease them from the nation. Clearly, on such a system, the earth might be inclosed, occupied, and cultivated in entire subordination to the law of equal freedom.

9. No doubt great difficulties must attend the resumption, by mankind at large, of their rights to the soil. The question of compensation to existing proprietors is a complicated one—one that perhaps cannot be settled in a strictly equitable manner. But there are others besides the landed class to be considered. The rights of the many are in abeyance. To deprive others of their rights to the use of the earth is to commit a crime inferior only in wickedness to the crime of taking away their lives or personal liberties.

10. The right of each man to the use of the earth, limited only by the like rights of his fellow-men, is immediately deducible from the law of equal freedom. The maintenance of this right necessarily forbids private property in land. The theory of the coheirship of all men to the soil is consistent with the highest civilization, and, however difficult it may be to embody that theory in fact, equity sternly commands it to be done.

In the foregoing digest, beyond one or two connecting words, the language is that of Mr. Herbert Spencer himself. Does it not constitute an unanswerable argument in favor of the nationalization of the land? If the author would permit it to be reprinted, what an admirable tract the ninth chapter of "Social Statics" would be for the propagation of Socialistic principles! But he now seems to repudiate the offspring of his own genius! We hav, however, a right to ask that, instead of a vague repudiation in general terms, Mr. Herbert Spencer should tell us specifically what deductions he has abandoned and why he has abandoned them. We might then endeavor to answer his answers to his own propositions. Yours, JOHN LAIDLER, Bricklayer.

What to Do and How.

Mr. Burnham's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 4th, appeared at a time when I was in "the grip" of a foe compelling all my attention, when Mr. Burnham's allegation of popish tendencies in me was not a sufficient counter-irritant to attract much notice. A second reading of his article now only tempts me to a few brief remarks upon it. As to my charge that his articles exhibit "pernicious partisanship," which he repels as impossible, I simply affirm that his second presents even better evidence of it than his first. My statement that the present officers of the American Secular Union hav made a success of other affairs in this world, he says, implies "that they will make a success in another world," when he well knows that the real implication intended was that it was fair to expect that their business abilities would enable them to manage the affairs of the Union successfully. Again he twists my words unfairly to make them imply that the Union had never before had so efficient officers, when it is easy to see that I laid stress on their leisure and opportunity to do good service, and in this comment I necessarily meant to indicate only the three executiv officers, and not to include myself—having little spare time to devote to American Secular Union work.

I really think the Union never had abler officers than Wakeman, Leland and Palmer, but they had not the leisure to giv it much time, and the Union was not then paying for all of one person's time.

Mr. Burnham dubs me pope because I gave "the real interpretation of the constitution, its purposes and aims." He would hav used his time and space to better advantage than by putting unwarranted implications to my words, if he had shown wherein my interpretation of the constitution, etc., was incorrect. Now, let him either prove me wrong or say whether he is for or against the objects stated.

In Freethought of January 4th, Mr. W. F. Jamieson comments on "The Scope of Conventions," and writes as follows:

> Now the question is, Should the call be made broader, or the convention narrower? If the Secular congress and state Secular Unions exist for the "sole purpose" of Secularizing the state, then I think there is urgent necessity for Liberals all over the United States to organize Liberty lodges. When sufficiently numerous in a county, say four lodges, to hold regular quarterly assemblies at various points in the county. When there are six counties organized call a state Liberty lodge. When there are fifteen, or even a dozen, state lodges, call a national Liberty lodge. The state lodges to meet once a year, the national once in three years. Such societies would strengthen the Secular congress and state Secular Unions. The calls of all Liberty lodges should be as free as liberty, fraternal as humanity; the discussions should exclude no question appertaining to the welfare of the race, should include all subjects covered by science.

That is a good suggestion, which ought some time to materialize—the sooner the better—but in the mean time the local branch organizations of the American Secular Union can serve as Liberty lodges, and be so named, if the locals prefer.

The American Secular Union has not proposed to hamper or limit the purposes and work of locals. They are even advised and urged to keep up the interest of regular meetings by discussions on all lines of radical, political, and social reforms. They hav all the year round to devote to any variety of debates that may entertain the members, and serve to keep them a-coming to meetings, but there are three reasons why this cannot now be the policy of national conventions of the American Secular Union: first, because of the limitations of its constitution, second, the limitations of time, and third, because it is the best policy in any society organized for action—not merely for debate—to take hold of but a few practical things at a time. Our local Liberal clubs, leagues, or lodges may be run mainly for entertainment or instruction, and as occasion offers effect some useful reform in Secularization or any line of Radical work at home, but our national conventions ought as far as possible to be centers and occasions for concentrated effort to do something, or for laying the plans for doing something, to promote the stated objects of the American Secular Union, and as we grow in strength and wealth and ability to undertake a greater variety of reform work, we can expand the purposes of the American Secular Union, or organize other national conventions for practical work in other directions.

Secular Thought prints the constitution of the Secular Society of Des Moines, Ia., as follows:

> 1. To combat the inherent superstition of all religions; to oppose intemperance, lawlessness, polygamy, free love, and Anarchy; to uphold the light of science and to encourage investigation, advocating at all times the supremacy of reason. 2. To destroy nothing that is good, but to pull the weeds and uproot only such trees as bear poisonous fruit. 3. To disseminate knowledge; to teach the purest morality both by precept and example; to discourage war, bloodshed, and unjust persecution; to annul the aggressiv movement of any sect or people, and to oppose by rational appeal any spirit hostil to the well-being of the human race. 4 To labor assiduously for the accomplishment of the Nine Demands of Liberalism as adopted by the American Secular Union.

Other local societies may favor Anarchy or Socialism, and some may prefer a broader or narrower platform than that adopted in Des Moines—many being directly opposed to others in certain points—but all that indorse the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union can help Liberalism and Secularism by "laboring assiduously" to support its officers and its work. E. B. FOOTE, JR.

Truth Needs No Bolstering.

Your paper is called THE TRUTH SEEKER.

This is a modest name. It does not claim to hav the truth, but to be seeking for it.

I would be a truth seeker. I hav sought after it for many years. I constantly hear the voices of many minds, who say, "Lo here," and "Lo there, this is the truth!" I reach out my hands and grasp it, as a verity; but soon it palls on my senses, and in my hands crumbles to dust. I look about me into this selfish man-built world and ask, Who is there in all this monopoly of wealth and position that stands on tenable ground and may not hav both wealth and position swept away from them by the incoming tide? In short, what is the reality, the substance, of our lives? The Talmagean Christian says, "Look to Christ, he will guide you unto all truth." THE TRUTH SEEKER says, "This is nonsense; we don't believe in your Christianity; it isn't large enough to take in all nations and peoples." Away with professors of religions and builders of magnificent cathedrals while there are homeless wanderers, and children left alone either to beg or starve!

As our minds develop, we are no longer satisfied to be followers of traditions or man-made theories. We ask the bigot and dogmatist to allow us freedom to seek for truth in our own way. And what we ask for we must cheerfully grant to others, and it is a stubborn fact which can never be set aside that ridicule and sarcasm hav neither reason or logic, and therefore do not win souls to the love of truth. When we love our fellow-man as ourselvs we shall care little what his belief is; we shall see in him only a brother like ourselvs. If we know he is hampered by error and superstition we will not tear the cloak off too hastily, but warm him so with the sunshine of our better humanity and help him with our deeds of love and kindness that he will know it is far better to liv the truth than to be a mere speculator about subjects which can be of no use to us in this or any stage of existence.

Let us hav no putting down of stakes, and glorifying any ism. We are as yet but only a little way up the mount of investigation. Let us not go so hastily as to lose sight of the landmarks here and there along the road. They may be of use to us when we reach the top, and the full glare of truth dawns upon us. They will serve as plummet and rule, and the details will be necessary to show how each part goes to make the grand composit whole. SARA E. HERVEY.

Onset, Mass.

The Washington Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Long ere this time the readers of your splendid paper know what is being done in Washington for the cause of mental liberty.

Brother C. B. Reynolds is working with a will to put Freethought in keen fighting trim to meet the insidious foe of progress and reform, viz, orthodoxy.

In his communication which appeared in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER he has set forth the aims and objects of the leading Liberals of Washington, and what they hope to gain by organization, much more fully than I could ever hope to do so. I will be brief.

As secretary of the state central committee I wish to urge the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER into activ and earnest work in behalf of our coming convention. Now is the time, and we hope all the believers in the Nine Demands will be prompt in sending aid to the central committee so that success may be guaranteed, and the flag kept above the cross in the grand new state of Washington.

The hall has been secured and a splendid program arranged, and all who can attend will be richly rewarded, as we expect to hav some of the most eloquent men and women in the West address the convention.

Over eight hundred letters hav been sent out to Liberals all over the state, and it is the hope of the committee to see a large and enthusiastic attendance on Jan. 28, 29, 30, 1890.

Delegates are earnestly requested to assemble at Freed's hall on Ninth street, between Olive and Pine streets (the electric street-cars run within a few steps of the hall), on Tuesday morning, January 28th, at 9:30, sharp.

The sessions of the convention will be held at 9:30 A.M. and 2 P.M. each day. Banner presentation and address by Ex-Senator R. Winsor at 3:30 P.M., Tuesday. Evenings devoted to public lectures. An admirable and most attractiv program.

All coming over the Northern Pacific railroad will purchase regular tickets and ask for certificates for delegates to the "Washington convention of Secularists at Seattle." Such certificates, when signed by C. B. Reynolds at the convention, entitle bearers to return tickets for one-fifth fare. Be sure to get "delegate's certificate" when purchasing ticket. The same reduction is promised on the Hunt system.

We hav plenty of good material in Washington if it can only be utilized, and it is to be hoped that can be done through a practical organization.

Mr. George M. Boman is doing a vast deal of good, practical work, and Liberalism can always find him employment, and no opportunity is let go by default by that earnest worker.

In closing let me appeal to every Liberal in Washington to aid in the necessary and important work of state organization, and if you cannot attend the convention, do what you can for the cause in a financial way. Those desiring to send money to aid in the work can address the same to P. Wickstrom, treasurer, corner of Eighth and Columbia streets, Seattle, Wash., or,

Secretary State Central Committee.

The True Story of the Religious Riot at Axtell, Kan.

One Rev. J. G. White, of Stanford, Ill., struck our town and hit it hard last October, but we still liv, move, and hav a being. He came of his own accord, and billed the town to lecture in the Presbyterian church, on "Romanism Not of God." He delivered the first lecture October 22d, and announced that the next night he would lecture on "Auricular Confession Exposed," at the Methodist Episcopal church, to men only, and billed the town himself the next day. But said lecture did not materialize. The Hibernians sent couriers out and brought in their full force, about fifty men, and early in the evening of said lecture they met at the Hibernian hall and organized for the purpose of breaking up said lecture. The Methodist Episcopal church was well filled with the people of the town and country. The speaker was ready to commence his lecture, when the mob marched straight from the hall to the Methodist Episcopal church; and about half of them entered the church. The speaker had just commenced his lecture, when, by a given signal from their leader, the riot commenced. And it was pandemonium from that on. Pistols, clubs, and shillalehs were flourished in a manner to make an Infidel think there was a sure-enough hell, and that right here on earth, and that too in the Methodist Episcopal church—just what they hav always preached, but never so forcibly demonstrated. The mob sang "John Brown's Body," and hollaed, "Rats! rats!" "To hell with the law!" "Pull him out!" "Kill him!" Some of the audience were knocked down, some fell down between the seats, and others jumped out at the windows, and the mob shouted, "Hurrah for ould Ireland." It made me think of bleeding Kansas and the uproar along about 1858–1860. The mayor of the town and a small force of resolute men stood between the speaker and the mob and stopped them, preventing them from getting the speaker. The seats were broken and the dear old Bible was trampled under-foot. Oh, my! but the brethren did feel so bad about it; they said something about desecrating the holy book of God.

The mayor then told the mob if they would leave there should not be any lecture that night. The mob then returned to their hall and commenced building a bonfire to enthuse over their success, but the priest stopped them. Oh, how beautiful is the Christian religion, where the brethren dwell in love and peace together! "For we know we hav passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." The next day the citizens met in mass meeting to consider the situation, the mayor presiding. After mature deliberation it was resolved to call the Rev. Mr. White back and hav the lecture, not so much for the lecture, but to see if we lived in a free country. The mayor was authorized by the convention to see that order was maintained at all hazards, the citizens pledging themselvs to stand by him. He organized a strong police force and sent for a company of the state militia at Marysville, distance twenty-four miles. Mr. White was notified and came the day before the lecture, and was guarded at the hotel all night by order of the mayor.

At the hour of the lecture Mayor Sitler with his police force and a company of state militia marched to the town hall. There was a large audience, many coming from adjacent towns. The lecture was delivered, and one long to be remembered, especially by the Catholics. The rioters will be brought before our next term of court, sitting in February, to answer the charge of riot and conspiracy. The confession business is a very tender plant, and must be guarded at all hazards. It is strange, if the priest can pardon sins, that he should object to having it made public. Perhaps the Infidels would take a few job-lots. I do not know that the Protestant confession is much improvement on the Catholic, for we can just confess to God through Jesus Christ all by ourselvs in our little closet, and nobody will ever know it except Christ, and he is dead and dead men tell no tales. So take the confession as taught by the orthodox churches, and no wonder so many are jerked to Jesus at the end of a rope. If you believe in God, believe also in the power of the Great Whore of Babylon to raise hell generally when its confessional is attacked.

A New Sabbath Observance Argument.

The people of Lansing and vicinity, Michigan, hav been subject to a special divine favor in the form of a letter the original of which is multiplied through the assistance of a demoniac machine known under the name of printing-press, and numerous copies of said letter are spread among the faithful. Our compliments are due to its divine author for his correct German, and to G. H. Boppe, editor of the Freidenker, on behalf of ourselvs and our fellow-beings, for the great service he has rendered us in preserving this rare object, and for the present and future happiness of mankind so valuable a document, from oblivion. The title of the divine message is: seen, written in golden letters in the air, and sent to us through the assistance of god's angel Michael—— To whomsoever that copies this letter he will bow himself, but turn away from those who despise it.

Whosoever works on Sunday is damned. I, Jesus Christ, enjoin you, therefore, not to work on Sunday, but to proceed to church and pray with devotion, yet not with painted face, nor wearing expensiv lace, ribbons, or fashionable neck ornaments, neither with bangs nor false, braided hair. All of these giv birth to vanity and pride. From your riches you shall, with humble heart, donate to the poor. Believe, this letter is sent from me, that you do not continue to liv like an irrational animal. You hav six days of the week—in these you shall do your work, but the seventh day, being Sunday, you shall keep holy. If you neglect to do so, I will send war, starvation, famin, and epidemics, and punish you with those calamities I sent over the Egyptians in the time of Moses, making you flee from the land. I, Jesus Christ, command you also not to work too long on Saturdays, that you be able to get up early and attend church in due time—this to everyone, old or young, that you may possess devotional spirit and repent of your sins, so that they may be forgiven you. Struggle not for possession of silver and gold. Do no evil with my property; yet, above all, avoid pride, also such wishes and desires as are of the flesh, they being the cursed road that goes to hell. Still, remember I created you and can save you. Do nobody harm with your tongue. Do not rejoice when thy neighbor suffers, but take compassion on him. You, children, honor your father and mother, then it will go well with you. Whosoever does not believe and keep these commandments is eternally lost and damned. Also, leave off that terrible swearing; he that does not will be called to severe account, and the anger of God will now and ever be over him. I, Jesus Christ, hav written this letter in my own hand. Whosoever speaks against it or will not believe in it and who departs from me shall be given neither happiness nor blessings. Whosoever has a copy of this letter shall inform another person of it; if he does not, he shall be excluded from the Christian church and from my forgivness. And are your sins even so many as the sand in the ocean, as the grass of the field, and the stars in the heaven, yet they shall be forgiven if you show earnest repentance. Believe what the letter says. He that believes it not shall die and suffer pain in hell. Whosoever has this letter in the house or carries it about his or her person shall be protected from lightning as well as fire and water. Keep, therefore, these my commandments which I send to you through my angel Michael.

Brethren in unbelief, let each and every one of us get a copy of this heavenly patent-preservativ, believe it, show it, and do not lose it.

Correction and Explanation.

I made a mistake by numbering the days of the week wrong. George Washington did appoint Thursday, Nov. 26, 1789, as a day of thanksgiving. And again, Jan. 1, 1795, to giv thanks to the "Great Ruler of Nations," especially for suppressing the whisky rebellion. But there was no repetition of that kind of foolishness until the Infidel president, Abe Lincoln, came in.

Bruno's martyrdom was Feb. 17, 1600, which was Thursday. But Feb. 17, 1600, old style, was Feb. 6, new style, which was Sunday. The new style was adopted in Italy in 1582, but in England not until 1751. BURR.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

CHAPTER XIV.

EVIDENCE GATHERED FROM LINCOLN'S LETTERS, SPEECHES, AND CONVERSATIONS.

The Bible and Christianity—Christ's Divinity—Future Rewards and Punishments—Freedom of Mind—Fatalism—Providence—Lines in Copy-book—Parker—Paine—Opposition of Church—Rebukes Christians—Profanity—Temperance Reform—Golden Rule.

The testimony of eighty witnesses will now be supplemented by evidence from the tongue and pen of Lincoln himself. The greater portion of what he wrote and uttered against Christianity has perished; but enough has been preserved to demonstrate, even in the absence of other evidence, that he was not a Christian. From his letters, speeches, and recorded conversations, the following radical sentiments hav been extracted.

Notwithstanding the efforts of Holland and Bateman to prove that Lincoln was a believer in Christianity, it is admitted that in his conversation with Bateman he said:

I am not a Christian (Holland's Life of Lincoln, pp. 236, 237).

When his Christian friends at Petersburg interfered to prevent his proposed duel with Shields and told him that it was contrary to the teachings of the Bible and Christianity, he remarked:

The Bible is not my book, nor Christianity my profession (Letter of W. Perkins).

While at Washington, in a letter to his old friend, Judge Wakefield, written in 1862, in answer to inquiries respecting his belief and the expressed hope that he had become convinced of the truth of Christianity, he replied as follows:

My earlier views of the unsoundness of the Christian scheme of salvation and the human origin of the scriptures hav become clearer and stronger with advancing years and I see no reason for thinking I shall ever change them.

In a discussion touching upon the paternity of Jesus, he said:

There must hav been sexual intercourse between man and woman, and not between God and his daughter.

The above words were uttered in the presence of Mr. Green Carruthers and Mr. W. A. Browning, of Springfield.

Lincoln contended that Jesus was either the son of Joseph and Mary, or the illegitimate son of Mary.

In a conversation with his friend, Mr. E. H. Wood, of Springfield, concerning the doctrin of endless punishment, he said:

There is no hell.

In regard to this subject he often observed:

If God be a just God, all will be saved or none (Manford's Magazine).

The orthodox idea of God—a God that creates poor, fallible beings, and then forever damns them for failing to believe what it is impossible for them to believe—he abhorred. The Golden Rule was his moral standard, and by this standard he measured not only the conduct of man, but of God himself. Like the irrepressible Dr. T. L. Brown, he wanted God to "damn others as he would be damned himself." He delighted to repeat the epitaph of the old Kickapoo Indian, Johnnie Kongapod:

Here lies poor Johnnie Kongapod;
Hav mercy on him, gracious God,
As he would do if he were God
And you were Johnnie Kongapod.

Lincoln thought that God ought at least to be as merciful as a respectable savage.

Many contend that the doctrin of future rewards and punishments, even if untrue, has a restraining influence upon the masses of mankind. That Lincoln did not share this fallacious opinion, is shown by the following extract from an address delivered in Springfield in 1842:

Pleasures to be enjoyed, or pains to be endured, after we shall be dead and gone, are but little regarded. . . . There is something so ludicrous, in promises of good, or threats of evil, a great way off, as to render the whole subject with which they are connected, easily turned into ridicule. "Better lay down that spade you're stealing, Paddy—if you don't, you'll pay for it at the day of judgment." "Be the powers, if ye'll credit me so long I'll take another" (Lincoln Memorial Album, p. 91).

Commenting upon the question of one's returning and communicating with his friends after death, he observed:

It is a doubtful question whether we ever get anywhere to get back (Statement of E. H. Wood).

An observation which he repeatedly made, was the following:

No man has a freedom of mind (Testimony of W. H. Herndon).

His fatalistic notions are confirmed by his own words:

I hav all my life been a fatalist. What is to be will be; or, rather, I hav found all my life, as Hamlet says,

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them how we will"

(Every-Day Life of Lincoln, p. 198).

The following was a favorit maxim with him:

What is to be will be, and no prayers of ours can arrest the decree (Statement of Mrs. Lincoln).

In a speech on Kansas, delivered in 1856, he used the following words in regard to providence:

Friends, I agree with you in providence; but I believe in the providence of the most men, the largest purse, and the longest cannon.

The writer has in his possession, among others of Lincoln's papers, a leaf from his copybook, tattered and yellow from age, on which, just sixty-six years ago, Lincoln, a school-boy of fourteen, wrote the following characteristic lines:

Abraham Lincoln, his hand and pen;
He will be good, but God knows when.

If by good he meant pious, the prophecy was never fulfilled.

But a short time before he was elected president, he said to Dr. Ray:

I think that I stand about where that man [Theodore Parker] stands (Statement of Rev. Robert Collyer).

The author whose writings exerted the greatest influence upon Lincoln's mind, in a theological way, was Thomas Paine. Ah! that potential "Age of Reason!" Criticise it as you may, no one ever yet carefully perused its pages and then honestly affirmed that the Bible is the infallible word of God. Herndon and others declare that Paine was a part of Lincoln from 1834 till his death. To a friend he said:

I never tire of reading Paine (Statement of James Tuttle).

In the later years of his life, when the subject of religion was mentioned, with a knowing smile, he was wont to remark:

It will not do to investigate the subject of religion too closely, as it is apt to lead to Infidelity (Manford's Magazine).

It has been stated that Lincoln was opposed in his political campaigns on account of his disbelief. This is confirmed by a letter he wrote to Martin M. Morris, of Petersburg, Ill., March 26, 1843. In this letter, he says:

There was, too, the strangest combination of church-influence against me. Baker is a Campbellite; and therefore, as I suppose, with few exceptions, got all that church. My wife has some relativs in the Presbyterian churches, and some with the Episcopal churches; and therefore, wherever it would tell, I was set down as either the one or the other, while it was everywhere contended that no Christian ought to go for me, because I belonged to no church—was suspected of being a Deist. . . . Those influences levied a tax of a considerable per cent upon my strength throughout the religious controversy (Lamon's Life of Lincoln, p. 271).

He never changed his opinions, and the church never ceased to oppose him. In the Bateman interview, seventeen years later, he was compelled to note its relentless intolerance:

Here are twenty-three ministers of different denominations, and all of them are against me but three; and here are a great many prominent members of the churches, a very large majority of whom are against me (Holland's Life of Lincoln, p. 236).

For thirty years the church endeavored to crush him, but when in spite of her malignant opposition, he achieved a glorious immortality, this same church, to hide the mediocrity of her devotees, attempts to steal his deathless name.

In a speech delivered in Springfield, in 1857, alluding to the negro, he said:

All the powers of the earth seem rapidly combining against him. Mammon is after him, . . . and the theology of the day is fast joining in the cry (Lincoln Memorial Album, p. 100).

The theology of the day was orthodox Christianity. "In this sentence," says Mr. Herndon, "he intended to hit Christianity a left-handed blow, and a hard one."

In his second inaugural address, referring to the contending Christian elements in the civil war, he says:

Both read the same Bible and pray to the same God, and each invokes his aid against the other.

What a commentary upon the hypocritical assumption that Christians possess an infallible moral standard, is contained in the above words!

The "Lincoln Memorial Album" pretends to giv the second inaugural complete, but omits the words quoted. As this address comes almost immediately after his reputed speech to the "Illinois clergyman," the editor probably noticed a lack of harmony between the two, and thought that the retention of these heretical words would cast suspicion upon the genuinness of that remarkable confession. The "Memorial Album" is a meritorious work, but had Mr. Oldroyd manifested as great a desire to present the genuin utterances of Lincoln as the apocryphal, its value would hav been enhanced. The unmutilated version of the last inaugural may be found in Holland's "Life of Lincoln," pp. 503, 504; Arnold's "Life of Lincoln," pp, 403, 404; Arnold's "Lincoln and Slavery," pp. 625–627; and "The Every-day Life of Lincoln," pp. 681, 682.

No president, probably, was ever so much annoyed by the clergy as Lincoln. The war produced an increased religious fervor, and theological tramps innumerable, usually labeled "D.D.," visited the White House, each with a mission to perform and a precious morsel of advice to offer. In the following caustic words, he expresses his contempt for their officiousness:

I am approached with the most opposit opinions and advice, and by religious men who are certain they represent the divine will. . . . I hope it will not be irreverent in me to say, that if it be probable that God would reveal his will to others, on a point so connected with my duty, it might be supposed he would reveal it directly to me (Religious Convictions of Abraham Lincoln).

Equally pertinent, and, indeed, similar, was his language to a pious lady, a Friend, who came as God's agent to instruct him what to do:

I hav neither time nor disposition to enter into discussion with the Friend, and end this occasion by suggesting for her consideration the question, whether, if it be true that the Lord has appointed me [she claimed that he had] to do the work she has indicated, it is not probable that he would hav communicated knowledge of the fact to me as well as to her (Every-day Life of Lincoln, pp. 536, 537)?

He steadily prohibited his generals from meddling with the religious affairs of those residing within the limits of their respectiv departments, and at the same time counseled them not to permit the pretended sanctity of the church to shield offenders from justice.

In a letter to General Curtis, censuring the provost-marshal of St. Louis for interfering with church matters, he writes:

The United States Government must not undertake to run the churches. When an individual in a church, or out of it, becomes dangerous to the public interest he must be checked.

In an order relating to a church in Memphis, issued May 13, 1864, he said:

If there be no military need for the building, leave it alone, neither putting any one in or out of it, except on finding some one preaching or practicing treason, in which case lay hands upon him, just as if he were doing the same thing in any other building.

During the war his attention was called to the notoriously bad character of army chaplains. He expressed his contempt for them, and for orthodox preachers generally, by relating the following story:

Once, in Springfield, I was going off on a short journey, and reached the depot a little ahead of time. Leaning against the fence just outside the depot was a little darky boy, whom I knew, named Dick, busily digging with his toe in a mud-puddle. As I came up, I said, "Dick, what are you about?" "Making a church," said he. "A church?" said I; "what do you mean?" "Why, yes," said Dick, pointing with his toe, "don't you see? there is the shape of it; there's the steps and front door—here's the pews, where the folks set—and there's the pulpit." "Yes, I see," said I, "but why don't you make a minister?" "Laws," answered Dick, with a grin, "I hain't got mud enough!" (Anecdotes of Lincoln, p. 86).

The most highly aristocratic church in Washington is St. John's Episcopal church. So very aristocratic is it that applicants for membership deem it necessary to giv references respecting their social standing in the community. The New York Star relates the following joke which Lincoln once perpetrated at the expense of this church:

One day during the war a young officer called on him to secure an appointment in the army, and brought with him letters of recommendation signed by the F. F. V.'s in the District of Columbia. There had been no application for office before President Lincoln so strongly supported by the aristocracy, and, turning to the young man he said he would giv him the appointment and handed him back the papers. "Don't you want to place the papers on file?" asked the office-seeker. "I supposed that was the custom." "Yes, that is the custom," said President Lincoln, "but you had better take them with you, as you might want to join St. John's church."

Did Lincoln ever use profane language? If he did, this fact will afford no evidence to Freethinkers that he was a disbeliever in Christianity. Freethinkers are as free from this vice, if vice it be, as Christians. Very pious persons, however, such as Lincoln is represented to hav been by his Christian biographers, are very careful about their use of profane words. Christ commanded his followers to pray in private and bade them swear not at all. Devout Christians usually pray in public and swear in private. Lincoln was but little addicted to profanity, but if he had occasion to use a word of this character he did not go to his closet to use it. In a business letter to a friend, he said:

A d——d hawk-billed Yankee is here besetting me at every turn (Lamon's Life of Lincoln, p. 316).

In a letter to Speed, concerning an alleged murder case, he wrote:

Hart, the little drayman that hauled Molly home once, said it was too damned bad to hav so much trouble and no hanging (Ibid., p. 321).

For the sake of pleasing the "fools," he attached his signature to "the pious nonsense of Seward." With equal readiness he indorsed the profane nonsense (?) of Stanton. The patriotic Lovejoy had devised a military scheme which he believed would prove beneficial to the Union cause, and obtained an order from the president for its execution. He took the order to Stanton, but all that ever resulted from it, was the following spirited colloquy:

"Did Lincoln giv you an order of that kind?" said Stanton. "He did, sir." "Then he is a d——d fool," said the irate Secretary. "Do you mean to say the president is a d——d fool?" asked Lovejoy, in amazement. "Yes, sir, if he gave you such an order as that." The bewildered Illinoisan betook himself at once to the President, and related the result of his conference. "Did Stanton say I was a d——d fool?" asked Lincoln at the close of the recital. "He did, sir, and repeated it." After a moment's pause, and looking up, the President said: "If Stanton said I was a d——d fool, then I must be one, for he is nearly always right, and generally says what he means" (Every-Day Life of Lincoln, pp. 483, 484).

At a cabinet meeting, in 1863, when a conflict between the president and Congress regarding the admission of certain representativs from loyal districts of the South, which he favored, was threatened, he turned to Secretary Chase, and exclaimed:

There it is, sir. I am to be bullied by Congress, am I? If I do I'll be d——d!

When Lincoln visited New Orleans he attended a slave sale. A beautiful girl, almost white, was placed upon the auction block and exposed to the grossest indignities. As he turned to leave, boiling with indignation, he exclaimed:

By God, if I ever get a chance to hit that institution, I will hit it hard!

Thirty years after the chance came. He struck the blow—a mortal one.

Like most Freethinkers, Lincoln was a genuin reformer. The antislavery reform was not the only reform that enlisted his support. At an early day he espoused the temperance cause. When the church was the ally of intemperance as it was of slavery—when, to use his own words, "From the sideboard of the parson down to the ragged pocket of the houseless loafer intoxicating liquor was constantly found," he was laboring and lecturing in behalf of the Washingtonian movement. With the fervor of an enthusiast, he exclaims in true Freethought language:

Happy day, when, all appetites controled, all passions subdued, all matter subjugated, mind, all-conquering mind, shall liv and move, the monarch of the world! Glorious consummation! Hail, fall of fury! Reign of Reason, all hail! (Lincoln Memorial Album, p. 96).

To sumptuary laws and to the denunciatory methods so common among orthodox Christians to-day, he was, however, strenuously opposed. He says:

It is not much in the nature of man to be driven to anything; still less to be driven about that which is exclusivly his own business (Ibid, p. 86).

When the conduct of men is designed to be influenced, persuasion, kind, unassuming persuasion, should ever be adopted (Ib., p. 87).

His nephew, Mr. Hall, informed me that Lincoln once made it cost a meddlesome clergyman, of Coles county, eighty dollars for seizing and destroying a quart of whisky, valued at twelve and a half cents, and belonging to a relativ of theirs.

In this chapter I wish to present some radical thoughts, not from the pen of Lincoln himself, but which in the original text from which they are taken bear unmistakable signs of his approval. Mr. D. W. C. Shattuck, an old and respected merchant of Wayland, Mich., has in his possession a book which belonged to Lincoln. Its history is as follows. Shortly after Lincoln's election to the presidency a young man from Springfield, Ill., and a relativ or intimate acquaintance of Lincoln's, came to board with Mr. Shattuck, who then resided in Kalamazoo. Looking over the contents of his trunk one day the young man picked up a book and at the same time remarked: "That book belongs to Abe Lincoln. I forgot to return it to him before leaving Springfield. It is his favorit book, and I must not fail to return it." Mr. Shattuck expressing a desire to peruse the work, it was handed to him, and the young man being soon after unexpectedly called away, it was forgotten. It proved to be a volume of the writings of Lord Bolingbroke, the great English Infidel. On a fly-leaf was the signature of Abraham Lincoln. In the work certain passages which seem to hav especially impressed Lincoln are marked with a pencil and in a manner peculiar to him. The following are the passages he marked, which I hav copied from the book, and which evidently received his unqualified indorsement:

Abbadie says in his famous book, that the gospel of St. Matthew is cited by Clemens bishop of Rome, a disciple of the apostles; that Barnabas cites it in his epistle; that Ignatius and Polycarp receive it; and that the same fathers, that giv testimony for Matthew, giv it likewise for Mark. Nav your lordship will find, I believe, that the present bishop of London, in his third pastoral letter, speaks to the same effect. I will not trouble you nor myself with any more instances of the same kind. Let this, which occurred to me as I was writing, suffice. It may well suffice; for I presume the fact advanced by the minister and the bishop is a mistake. If the fathers of the first century do mention some passages that are agreeable to what we read in our evangelists, will it follow that these fathers had the same gospels before them? To say so is a manifest abuse of history, and quite inexcusable in writers that knew, or should hav known, that these fathers made use of other gospels, wherein such passages might be contained, or they might be preserved in unwritten tradition. Besides which I could almost venture to affirm that these fathers of the first century do not expressly name the gospels we hav of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

Writers of the Roman religion hav attempted to show, that the text of the holy writ is on many accounts insufficient to be the sole criterion of orthodoxy: I apprehend too that they hav shown it. Sure I am that experience, from the first promulgation of Christianity to this hour, shows abundantly with how much ease and success the most opposit, the most extravagant, nay the most impious opinions, and the most contradictory faiths, may be founded on the same text; and plausibly defended by the same authority. Writers of the reformed religion hav erected their batteries against tradition; and the only difficulty they had to encounter in this enterprise lay in leveling and pointing their cannon so as to avoid demolishing, in one common ruin, the traditions they retain, and those they reject. Each side has been employed to weaken the cause and explode the system of his adversary; and, whilst they hav been so employed, they hav jointly laid their axes to the root of Christianity; for thus men will be apt to reason upon what they hav advanced. If the text has not that authenticity, clearness, and precision which are necessary to establish it as a divine and a certain rule of faith and practice; and if the tradition of the church from the first ages of it till the days of Luther and Calvin, has been corrupted itself, and has served to corrupt the faith and practice of Christians; there remains at this time no standard at all of Christianity. By consequence either this religion was not originally of divine institution, or else God has not provided effectually for preserving the genuin purity of it, and the gates of hell hav prevailed, in contradiction to his promis, against the church.

I hav read somewhere, perhaps in the works of St. Jerome, that this father justifies the opinion of those who think it impossible to fix any certain chronology on that of the Bible; and this opinion will be justified still better, to the understanding of every man that considers how grossly the Jews blunder whenever they meddle with chronology.

The resurrection of letters was a fatal period: the Christian system has been attacked, and wounded too, very severely since that time.

When interrogated as to why he had never united with any church, he replied:

When you show me a church based on the Golden Rule as its only creed, then I will unite with it.

He never joined a church, because of all the Christian sects, not one could show such a creed. The Golden Rule—conceding to others the same rights he claimed for himself—was, however, the very cornerstone of Freethought, and hence he remained a Freethinker.

Eminent Women.

MARY WASHINGTON.

While the Father of our Country has been eulogized and almost deified by one and all, few realize that it was to his mother he owed all that he became. Few knew that he was indebted to this wise, sensible, and intelligent woman for his grand and sterling qualities.

In this age of male supremacy, Americans fail to realize all they owe to woman, and especially to the mother of Washington. Mary Washington was left a widow in 1743. She had five children, of whom George was the eldest, and he was only eleven years old when his father died.

The mother took full charge of the education, training, and rearing of the children. She was truly a remarkable woman. Firm, self-reliant, and constant of purpose, she achieved wonders.

To the children she was a companion, counselor, and friend, all in one. She encouraged them to become mentally, physically, and morally wise. They were stimulated by her to athletic as well as intellectual exercise. She taught them the value of industry and application, and made them see the true worth of labor, as a means to independence, respectability, and well-doing.

While she exacted implicit obedience from her children and maintained a strict domestic disciplin, she was genuinly kind, cheerful, and sympathetic.

Her own self-denial and self-control was one of the best of examples for the children, causing each to work for the general good of all.

From his mother Washington learned those habits of application, industry, and regularity for which he was so noted in after life, and to her he was indebted for his habits of temperance and activity, which made him so physically strong and robust a man.

The beautiful love of truth, which was a part of his very nature, was built up in him by his mother's example and continually reiterated counsels. Truth was taught to her children as the most priceless of all the virtues, and it became to Washington the guiding star of his life.

When he was fourteen he wanted to go to sea, but his wise mother persuaded him to relinquish his project and become an engineer, which employment was finally merged into that of commander of the colonies.

When the intelligence of the successful passage of the Delaware by Washington and his brave companions in arms was communicated to his mother she received the tidings with placid self-possession, but in relation to such portions as contained eulogistic allusions to her son, she simply remarked that "George appeared to hav deserved well of his country for such signal services," and added: "But, my good sirs, here is too much flattery; still, George will not forget the lessons I hav taught him—he will not forget himself, though he is the subject of so much praise."

The citizens of Fredericksburg celebrated the arrival of Washington and his suite by a splendid ball, at which Mary Washington was specially invited. All was eager suspense until there entered, unannounced and unattended, the mother of Washington on the arm of her son.

Hushed was each noisy tone and whispered word, as with quiet dignity and unaffected grace they slowly advanced.

All hastened to approach them, the European officers to be presented to the mother of their beloved commander, and old friends, neighbors, and acquaintances to tender their compliments and congratulations.

"Washington to the last moments of his mother yielded to her will with the most implicit obedience, and felt for her person the highest respect and most enthusiastic attachment. . . . Previous to his departure for France, Lafayette visited Fredericksburg expressly for the purpose of making his adieus to the mother of Washington."

When he, accompanied by one of her grandsons, approached the house, he observed an aged lady working in the adjoining garden. She wore a dress of home manufacture, and a plain straw bonnet. "There, sir," said the boy, "is my grandmother." She received her distinguished guest with great cordiality, and with her usual frank simplicity of address.

"Ah, marquis," she exclaimed, "you see an old woman; but, come, I can make you welcome to my poor dwelling without the parade of changing my dress."

The marquis poured forth glowing encomiums of his former chief and friend, to which Mary only replied, "I am not surprised at what George has done, for he was always a good boy."

When starting to assume the duties of the presidency, he went to bid a last farewell to his aged mother; "he wept long, with bowed head, over the wasted form of his revered and much-loved parent." The mother, even in the last trying hour, was calm and heroic, and urged her son to "pursue the path in which public duty summoned him to depart."

Mary Washington retained her mental faculties unimpaired till death. She died in 1789 in her eighty-third year. In 1833 a monument was erected to her memory with the inscription, "Mary, the Mother of Washington." For the facts in the above sketch I am indebted to Professor Cottinger's "Rosa, the Educating Mother," a truly interesting work.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

J. P. Smith's Letter.

I hav received a letter from J. P. Smith, of Oneida county, in which he propounds a question which he desires me to answer through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. And as the letter is very short I will giv it entire:

Brother Peck: I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and consequently a sincere inquirer after truth. I hav somehow imbibed the idea that there is not a particle of matter, light and air not excepted, that is not in a compound condition.

Now, inasmuch as an eternal compound is an absurdity, there must hav been a time in the eternity of the past when this compounding commenced. Now, the information I want is this: Did those primordial elements when in their simple elementary condition possess within themselvs the inherent principle of intelligence?

Intelligence exists, and the dictum of science is, and a true one, that something cannot proceed from nothing. Please inform me through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Very respectfully yours, J. P. SMITH.

In answer I would say I do not profess to be an adept in the solid sciences. And I hav been a little chary in regard to metaphysical discussion since I heard the story of the two Scotchmen: "Sandy, what is this they mean by metaphysics?" "Weel," replied the other, "when one chiel tries to tell another chiel something that he don't naw anything aboot himsel', that's what they calls metaphysics."

So the best I can do is to answer Brother Smith in a plain, every-day, common-sense way. We can not conceive of intelligence existing away out in empty space.

It is the theory of scientists that the matter composing our solar system was once diffused through space as impalpable haze.

Now, to my mind intelligence in this "haze" is just as unthinkable as it would be in empty space.

There was a time when there was no animal life on this planet. The idea of intelligence at that time involves as great an absurdity as the idea of intelligence existing in empty space. Hence we seem to be irresistibly driven to the conclusion that intelligence is the result of animal life. Or, if you prefer it, the result of nerve and brain force.

If this nebulous "haze" possessed the "inherent principles" of life, I would regard intelligence as a sequence.

Allow me to put the answer in another form. According to the best information that I am able to obtain, our moon is something like a desolation. There is neither water, atmosphere, nor animal life there. I cannot say that the moon was not once the abode of intelligent beings, but there are none there now.

Assuming this as a fact, can it be said, without outraging common sense, that there is intelligence in the moon to-day? This may be regarded as a moonshine argument, but it is candid and honest and helps me out with my idea.

I know that I am not as much inclined to follow out a course of reasoning through devious paths, as I am to jump at, what seem to me to be, common sense conclusions.

I will say, in short, that I regard that handful of matter—that wonderful intellectual battery—known as the human brain, as the source of human intelligence. I can no more conceive of intelligence without brain, than I can conceive of motion without matter. Nothing would make me feel more grateful than to hav the error pointed out if I am in mistake.

FADED FLOWERS.

WE shall print next week an article on the amendment to our national Constitution proposed by Senator Blair, which pledges the nation to maintain in all our states common schools in which shall be taught the principles of the Christian religion. This amendment has been reintroduced in this Congress by the same individual. The article which we shall print is by an American Christian missionary stationed on the island of Tahite, and he givs his fellow-Christians some unanswerable reasons why such a law is impossible of enforcement without making a union of church and state, which is repugnant to every American principle.

The Pictures.

The number of new subscribers necessary to continue the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER is being slowly obtained, and if more of our friends will exert themselvs to this end the full number will, we now think, be forthcoming. To last Tuesday, on which day the paper is sent to press each week, we had received one hundred and twenty-five additions to our list on this account. These hav practically come in within three weeks.

In addition, we acknowledged last week donations to the amount of $50.40. This sum is now enlarged by the following:

Joseph Rhody	$1 00
A. A. Bell, M.D.	1 00
H. Cellar	1 00
Andrew Willard	1 00
C. S. Tremaine	50
A. G. Church	1 00
Charles McArthur	5 00
George Geer	1 50
Mabel Tarbell	2 00
A. Schell	5 00

Making $69.40, which is substantial encouragement, and for which we return hearty thanks. In the "Letters from Friends" will be found, also, words of cheer, and some of criticism, for both sides are to be heard, and their words of wisdom taken to heart and pondered upon. As before, the opponents of the pictures are in a "hopeless minority," which, considering the fact that they can hardly be expected to back up their opinions with new subscribers obtained, and that consequently it is easier for them to vote effectivly than for the others, is evidence that but few, comparativly, indorse the view of Friend Parton.

The Minister and the Doubter.

The Rev. John Graham, of Grand Rapids, Mich., has found a doubter in town, one who has been giving him some pretty hard nuts to crack, as may be seen by his vain attempts to break the shells. The doubter is a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, as all doubters ought to be, and he sends us Mr. Graham's sermon in reply to the arguments, facts, and reasoning he has advanced to the reverend gentleman. There are only three paragraphs in the sermon with anything in them—and there is not much in these. This is the first:

"Let us state that you doubt the divinity of God. But every motion of the earth believes in God; and it is no mere poetical idea that sees upon the everlasting hills the golden wheel-tracks of God's chariot. The idea of God is no mere sentiment. The whole universe is wrought into order by the power of the divine one. There are two things by which one may recognize heaven, says a French philosopher, the firmament above him and the earth beneath him. The growth of a little flower, the painting of a butterfly's wing, often reveals to a doubter the truth of the divine supervision of the universe."

But what sort of an answer is that to the honest doubts of an Agnostic? "Every motion of the earth believes in God." The deuce it does! Where is the evidence for such an oratorical assertion? Will Mr. Graham lead that Grand Rapids doubter out upon the "everlasting hills" and show him a golden wheeltrack? and when he has found it, will he please say how he knows it to be a wheeltrack? If the idea of God is no mere sentiment, let us hav the facts which prove his existence. One fact will do; just one. Will he point to us a flood, or a famin, or a pestilence, as such proof? Can he show us a little flower growing and blossoming without air and earth and water and sunlight? Can he show us a painted butterfly without a pedigree? Can he hold before us anything that is not the result of natural laws and of natural causes to prove the existence of one more powerful than law? When he does, then will he be entitled to claim that he has begun to find some evidence of his God. Let us hav one fact as evidence that God can "perform the unusual," before we let our hair turn white with fear of him.

The second paragraph, in which our preacher attempts to argue with the doubter, is this:

"But what of Jesus Christ? Does he liv and move among us to-day? In answering the first of these questions men hav grown old. I might stand by the side of Christ this moment, and he would be unchanged. He did not need to go through the usual round of human experience to reach truth. It came to him through his own God-head. In his own words, he was as his father sent him. Jesus Christ in no sense allied himself with the great teachers of that or any other age. He had none of the tricks of modern reformers, but he taught as one having authority. There is no middle ground. Christ was divine, or he was not. If he is not what he claimed to be, then every agony he suffered was deserved. Let us face this fundamental question. If he is what he claims to be then he commands the worship of all. I lead you up to the doctrin of human conversion. His own words, prophetic as they were, marked his divinity. The coming of the Pentecost is a proof of the man, Christ Jesus. Similar testimony has come down the ages, and Luther, Bunyan, and Wesley are witnesses to the truth of his divinity. In this century there are thousands upon thousands of those who believe, and each for a different reason."

Is it possible that there is one man alive who can imagin for a moment there is any serious sense in such oratory as that? And yet it is heard from thousands of pulpits, and called "reasoning"—heaven save the mark! "It came to him through his own Godhead." Is there in that sentence any intelligible information? Does it mean anything? If so, what is it? What is a Godhead? Is every one who proclaims himself one sent by God (what is God?) to be accepted at his own estimate? Then why not take Mohammed, or that other impostor, Schweinfurth, for our savior? Their credentials are as good as Christ's—just as good—just the same. It is begging the question to say Christ deserved what he got if he was not as represented. The reverse of the assertion is more nearly true. If he was divine he could hav saved himself from his ignominious fate; being human, he was executed as any other alleged seditious person would hav been—as the Anarchists were, for instance, in Chicago. "If he was what he claims to be then he commands the worship of all." Aye, aye; IF he was what he claims to be (or what the ministers claim him to hav been) then worship away; but giv us some little evidence to show that he was a Christ? His words are no better than Schweinfurth's in proof of his claim. Prove your pentecost; prove that the events related in the second chapter of Acts did really occur. Tell who wrote Acts; say when he or she wrote it; show it to be something besides an emanation from a disordered or dishonest human brain. What did Luther know about Christ? Did he throw an inkstand at him, too? What sort of testimony did the drunken tinker Bunyan giv from his prison cell? Where did Wesley find his proof for Christ's divinity? Let us hav common sense on this matter, and not rodomontade. People believe in Christ because they hav been trained to, as the Mohammedans believe in Mohammed, the Buddhists in Buddha, the Confucians in Confucius, and not because of convincing evidence of the "divine mission" of these individuals.

Again, Mr. Graham says to the doubter:

"Let me take up for a moment the question of the supernatural. Life means freedom of action, power, and will. If I am not an animal, if this world is not my cradle and my grave; if beyond me are worlds controled by law, it is not difficult for me to believe in the supernatural. If I deny it, who am I to set up my little judgment against the evidences of this great truth? To deny the supernatural is the last act of the imbecility and the ignorance of human egotism. The men who tell us that God cannot perform the unusual are but a little handful during the last eighteen centuries. I think men will hesitate long before they exchange the teachings of Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Shakspere for those of Huxley, Darwin, and Spencer. Science, too, is on the side of the church, and I should be loth to giv up my faith in Galileo and Milton. Herbert Spencer is not the only scientist the world has seen."

This is more unsatisfactory, if possible, than the others. There is no freedom of action, no freedom of power, no freedom of the will. Man does as he must, as he is influenced to do by his heredity, his environment, and the forces or evidences which act upon his brain. Man knows nothing beyond phenomena; he cannot conceive of anything which human experience has not shaped for him. The brain is but a mirror; if there is nothing before it there is no reflection. Man, therefore, cannot conceive the supernatural. When he tries, he but givs it shapes that the race has seen. He makes his God a man, as the most powerful and intelligent of known organisms; his angels are young women, because young women please him best; his heaven is filled with gems and gold, for the same reason; his hell is a red-hot place of torment, because a furnace is his utmost conception of uncomfortableness. To affirm the supernatural "is the last act of the imbecility and the ignorance of human egotism." Worlds controled by natural law deny the supernatural, for the supernatural is that which theologically diseased brains conceive to be above law, and occurring wholly by the arbitrary act of some irresponsible, conflicting, inconsistent but omnipotent authority. But if there be a supernatural, man has not yet arrived at that point of development where he can say what it is. Miracles do not occur among intelligent people.

To say that science is on the side of the church is to flatly contradict fact. Mr. Graham's faith in Galileo is heresy to what was once orthodox Christianity, and what would still be orthodox Christianity if the church had not been enlightened, in spite of herself, by that science which she has ever opposed. The church was wrong and Galileo was right; but if that places science on the side of the church, language has no meaning and words are coined only to deceive.

What astonishes us most, in this answer to a doubter, is that any man, with even a theological seminary education, should imagin that he had solved a single one of the many problems which present themselvs to a man studying the Christian religion. To it we may very appropriately apply the words of Antonio's friend, changing the locality and the person spoken of: "Graham speaks an infinit deal of nothing, more than any man in all Michigan: his reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them, and when you hav them they are not worth the search." And yet he has done as well as any minister could do.

The Probation Doctrin.

At last we hav the real reason why the orthodox churchmen are so strongly opposed to the doctrin of probation after death, which some tender-hearted Christians would apply to the heathen, to the great and cooling comfort of those dusky pagans. Dr. Storrs, in the Independent, says: "I do not believe that any missionary society will ever be organized, or certainly will be long and effectivly maintained, in which this speculation becomes a controling practical force."

That is to say, if this doctrin becomes a dogma there will be no incentiv to spend money to convert the heathen and consequently the missionary business will languish.

And certainly this view seems reasonable. The probation doctrin, as Dr. Storrs says, justifies the expectation that if men do not hear the gospel in this life they will hav a vastly more extended space for repentance in the ages beyond, with the added advantage of an "immediate exhibition" of Christ, and that consequently the heathen will remark to the missionaries, "If you are convinced that chances for repentance are reserved for my people, in unlimited futures beyond the grave, why not leave us to enjoy the pleasant sins in which we delight, and of which we shall hav opportunity to repent when temptations are removed, and when he of whom you speak appears, in the large by and by?"

That Dr. Storrs is, in this, logical and clear, is plain enough. If the probation doctrin be true, the heathen are much better off without a knowledge of the gospel, as they are now without the presence of the missionaries. Instead of a lifetime they would hav an eternity in which to repent; and hav, besides, for their example and as proof of the claims of the gospel, the "exhibition" of Christ himself, instead of only the dubious word of the preachers. That the people who support the missionaries would not see this point, and consequently refrain from giving to the Missionary Society, is too much to hope. The only thing for the clergy to do, therefore, is to hold on to the damnation doctrin, or as Dr. Storrs puts it, "the present responsibility and condemnation of the heathen, as set forth with just and appalling emphasis in the New Testament." Clinging to this, as to the cross, the church can appeal for funds to convert the heathen—which she spends on herself.

To a Rationalist, however, this creedal hairsplitting and repairing of theological mechanism seems ridiculous. Before the occupants of hell are selected, it would be well to show that there is such a place. The dog baying the moon was a sensible brute, so far as results from his efforts were concerned, compared with the disputatious doctors of divinity who are endeavoring to dispose of corner lots in eternity to the financial advantage of themselvs while here on earth.

The Church and Her Poor.

Led by an Episcopalian monk some bedeviled workingmen in this city hav formed the "Church Association for the Advancement of the Interests of Labor," which they call the Cail, and the first thing the Association did at its first meeting last week was to pass this resolution:

"Resolved: That all buildings consecrated as parish churches or chapels to the worship of God should be open free to all his children, and that no seats should be sold for any service."

What good will that do? How many free seats in a church does it require to raise a man's wages, or to lower the price of provisions? How many to provide additional work for him? Are free seats in churches going to improve the filthy tenements in which he is now obliged to liv? Would free seats in Trinity church, for instance, rebuild the tumble-down houses from which that church draws hundreds of thousands of dollars income from the wage-earner? or would free seats in the chapels belonging to it squelch the liquor-selling on its property?

This is another way in which the monk, known as Father Huntington, proposes to abolish poverty: "Let us," he said, "try to bring Christ and God down to earth and to show the people, not the commercial, political-economy Christ of the present, not a financial God, but the old living God, and Christ the mechanic."

Suppose they do bring down the two fancies known as the "old living God" and "Christ the mechanic," what then? Didn't the "old living God" first pronounce the curse of labor on the race? Didn't "Christ the mechanic" preach submission to the powers ordained of God, and declare that the poor should be here always? Why, then, are the poor believers in these two alleged personalities rebelling? Let them be contented and enjoy their divine poverty, or put their religion aside, and demand justice, instead of the beggarly charity of sitting in cushioned pews paid for by those who hav grown rich from others' labor.

Still another brilliant way of abolishing poverty: A richly dressed woman said she had asked to attend the meeting as a representativ of the class supposed to be opposed to most of those present. "I want to ask you to remember," she said, "that our hearts beat the same as yours do, and that way down in the bottom of our natures all of us in one way or another acknowledge the brotherhood of man. We ponder over how to reach you: solve the problem by coming to us."

We should like to see workingmen coming to the Episcopalian "us!" Let the occupants of Trinity's tenements form a procession and go to the front door of any one of the trustees of that corporation, and see what the footman would say to them! Let them go to Bishop Potter, he is one of "us." Let them troop up to the fretted marble-fronted see house just opposit this office, and find out whether they would go up or down the marble steps! We will promis to sit in our front window and report the occurrence if they will do it.

It shows to what a depth the church has degraded the poor of its congregations, when we find them asking for free seats in a chapel instead of demanding a restitution of the millions of which it has robbed them. The man of to-day who thinks that in charity is to be found any remedy for the misery of the race is a medieval relic that the museums should secure and niche alongside their mummies.

To the Anarchists and Socialists.

The editor of the Twentieth Century says:

"All I ask of the church is to take off her mask, to cease pretending to be the poor man's friend, to come out squarely and boldly and say that she and her religion are dependent upon legal thieves for success, and, therefore, must stand in with the thieves. But she will never take off the mask. She is an organized hypocrit. And I am sorry to be obliged to say there are some Liberal Leagues that, in the matter of social reform, bear a very striking resemblance to her."

Does Mr. Pentecost mean to say that because the members of some Liberal Leagues see more important work to do than calling names, those Leagues are organized hypocrits?

And isn't it about time for the Anarchists and Socialists to cease abusing the Liberals because the latter do not agree with them in all things! For decency's sake, good gentlemen, allow us liberty to hold our own opinions without being subjected to abuse! We do not rail at you; we are perfectly willing that you should hav one or a million opinions, and we giv you a fair and candid hearing on any of them, and, if convinced that you are right, say so. And if we do not happen to believe that "there should be no remedy for disorder," as Mr. Pentecost thinks, or because we do not see that the complete submergence of our individuality in some "national army of industry," as the disciples of Bellamy preach, would be best for the world, why should we be called organized hypocrits?

The Socialists hav their organizations, and, strangely enough, so hav the Anarchists. But let a Liberal go into one of their meetings and tell them they should confine their reforms to showing that Christianity is false, and that it is useless to attempt to advance social reforms until the clutch of the church is torn from the throat of humanity, and at once the Socialists or Anarchists raise the cry of "No religious discussion! This is an organization for the abolition of poverty; the advancement of the race; the elevation of the downtrodden," and so on and so forth. But when the Liberals meet, then comes the Anarchist and Socialist, and because he is not denied a hearing, because the Liberals are liberal, he spreads himself all over the platform, occupies all the time, and abuses the members of the society because they cannot see that his hobby is the all-important and exclusiv topic of the day. This has been done in more than one Liberal League or Secular Union, and has broken up not a few. Our social reformers should reform themselvs in this regard.

There are a good many Liberals who are neither Socialists nor Anarchists; there are a good many Socialists and Anarchists who are not Liberals. There are, also, a good many Liberals, Socialists, and Anarchists who are all three, or think they are. We do not deny integrity of purpose, honesty of conviction, nor sincerity of motiv to the social agitators. They mean well; they should be listened to with respect, and not denounced as bigots and organized hypocrits. But if we do not agree with them shall we be vilified? Let every man act upon his convictions. On things settled, let us hav unity. On things not settled, free diversity. But in all things, let us hav charity.

Chaplains and Sunday Laws in Washington.

An item in the Seattle Press, Washington, states that a memorial to the legislature asking that chaplains be appointed for the senate and house, and that the daily session of each be opened with prayer, is being circulated all over the state. In Seattle the memorial was read in several of the churches two weeks ago, and "adopted by a rising vote."

Touching the matter, a member of the house of representativs of Washington writes us: "In both houses we open our sessions without prayer. You will notice in Section 11, Article 1, of the constitution, that it forbids the use of public money for religious worship or exercise. It was in the word exercise that we caught them on the chaplain question."

So it seems that without a change in the constitution of Washington the memorialists cannot succeed in their miserable attempt to giv their religion a state indorsement, and so make practical what all American citizens deny in theory—the union of the two. This abolition of prayer in Washington sets that state forth as a star of magnificent brilliancy in the crown of Liberty. Justice in this matter is at last done in one state of the Union.

Regarding a Sunday law for the state our friend in the legislature says: "A majority of both houses are really Freethinkers, but many of them are also politicians and would make no break that would hurt their politics; but yet I am in hopes, and encouraged to think that I can get through a Sunday law that will be quite liberal. I am convinced that the majority of the members would prefer none, but for policy's sake will hav to hav something."

Comment on that state of things is almost superfluous. Yet, to stiffen up the backbones of our Liberal friends in the Washington legislature we would respectfully ask them to look at California, with no Sunday law, and yet with prosperous politicians enough to govern the state somehow! Why cannot not only Washington but all the new states follow the example of their golden sister?

And there is another point the legislators of Washington should not entirely overlook. It is barely possible that by enacting a Sunday law they may lose more friends than they would if they did not enact one. Liberalism is coming to the front out there; it is rapidly being organized; and it is too much for sapient lawmakers to expect that Liberals will forever submit to the injustice imposed on them by tools of the church and go on voting for men who disregard their rights and are too cowardly even to express their own real sentiments. We had looked for more nobility of character, a greater breadth of thought, something larger, in the men of the great Northwest, than is pictured in our correspondent's letter.

The Literature Fund.

The Literature Fund has been increased during the past week by the following sums:

J. Bird	$1 00
Samuel Cohen	1 00
W. L. Johnson	50	$2 50
Previously acknowledged		47 00

With the help of this fund we are going to send our American missionary's argument against Blair's proposed amendment to our Constitution, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of next week, to our national lawmakers. They are getting so much religion from Wanamaker and his friends that a little antidote for the poison is necessary to save their minds from death.

THE comments of J. E. O'Brien, owner of the buildings in upper New York, for working whereupon ou Sunday six laborers were arrested recently, are significant. In answer to our inquiry as to what punishment was inflicted on the men, he writes: "None, as it was a case of necessity, but I had a great deal of bother with it. I went on their bonds and had to sign my name thirty-two times; the men twice each. Red tape! Lawyers!! Humbug!!! Reform!!!!" Substitute the word Ministers for lawyers, and Mr. O'Brien is not greatly wrong.

THE beggars of Rome hav been taking lessons from the priests, who keep weeping virgins, and tap their lachrymal glands for so much a tap—turn on the hydrant, as it were. One of the most noted fountains in Rome is a statue of Neptune in a shell, drawn by sea horses guided by Tritons. Legeud has it that if the traveler drinks of this fountain on the last night of his stay in Rome he will surely return some day to the Eternal City, and if he drops a penny into the basin making a wish, the latter will come true. Almost any night during the season that one visits the fountain one will find a party following out the time-honored custom, and in the shadows, but ready to come forth the instant the party leaves, are the Roman beggars ready to jump into the water after the penny.

FORT SILL, I. T., Dec. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav the pleasure to forward herewith $5—$3 for my subscription, $1 50 for the book named, and fifty cents toward continuing the grand illustrations of Heston. In my opinion they are very effectiv and striking.

CHARLES L. DE RUDIO.

ELK RAPIDS, MICH., Dec. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find subscription and fifty cents for two copies of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890. May your pictures still continue, as they tend to show the ridiculousness of what is claimed to be an inspired volume.

ALEX. CAMPBELL.

ELM SPRINGS, ARK., Dec. 22, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I hav failed so far to get a new subscriber. Mr. Heston's pictures or illustrations are all right, in the right place, at the right time. I want you to send me the ANNUAL for 290, and always remember me as a life-member of the TRUTH SEEKER family. J. W. DAY.

CERESOO, MICH., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5—fifty cents to continue the pictures, and $4.50 to go toward furnishing documents to Congress in opposition to the Sunday laws. I hav entered my eighty-fifth year, so my time here must be short.

Yours in the bonds of Humanity, THOS. KNIGHT.

NEW LANOASTER, KAN., Dec. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I write to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I could dispense with any of my other papers better than I could with it; in fact, I could not think of trying to do without it. I hope you may be able to continue the cartoons. Respectfully, J. H. JONES.

GREENWOOD, N. Y., Dec. 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to hav you keep up the pictures if you can, for I like to show them to my Christian friends and see them squirm. I would like to get a new subscriber, but cannot. Too much superstition. I inclose money for the ANNUAL, and other books as named. R. L. ALVORD.

FOUNTAIN, COL., Dec. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that you want more subscribers in order to be able to continue the pictures in it, in which I hope you will succeed, as I know they are one of the best features of the paper to most people. I inclose $10—$5 for two subscriptions, and the rest for books.

Yours fraternally, U. K. LOOK.

SAN JOSE, Dec. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $4—$3 for a renewal of my subscription, which does not expire until April; the balance, $1, is a contribution to help retain the pictures. The last, December 21st, representing Christianity as a dead ass, is worth a year's subscription. In the mean time I shall keep hustling for subscribers. Yours, L. R. TITUS.

AYER, MASS., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. Without THE TRUTH SEEKER the literature of the world would be incomplete. Without Ingersoll, where is the intellectual giant to vanquish every attacking foe? The greatest Infidels (?) hav been the greatest blessing to the world. The church's harness is all breeching—good at holding back.

ELIJAH MYRIOK.

HAMMONTON, N. J., Dec. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I notice that my time is nearly out for your excellent paper to visit us, so please find inclosed $3 25. Twenty-five cents is for the ANNUAL. If you are willing, I propose you giv me credit for the paper eight months, as that will take to a time when we may hav received from our crop again. The $1 is for you to use to the best of your judgment in spreading truth. I wish we were able to make it ten. I am on the side of the cartoons, but hav failed, as yet, to get the necessary accreditation of my vote—a new subscriber. Yours, as ever, D. R. WOLLISON.

MCKEESPORT, PA., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $6 for your paper for one year. I send a new subscriber. If all would do this, you would hav a boom. Wishing you a great and successful year in the grand work you are doing, hoping that this paper will increase in power and glory till its rays of truth will cover this fair land, I remain, Your sincere friend and brother, JOSEPH PLATTENBURG.

WILBER, NEB., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $11 and list of truth seekers for the year 1890. It is the best I could do, under the shadow of five churches, in a village of fifteen hundred inhabitants. There are many more in a transition state who will ripen up for 1891—all the result of Jamieson's and Remsburg's and THE TRUTH SEEKER'S efforts. I am authorized to vote for the pictures for all the inclosed names. H. KILGORE.

CLINTON, MO., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I am heartily in favor of continuing the pictures of Mr. Heston. They speak volumes, and for good, and reach a class of persons that nothing else will touch, and make an impression that is lasting and for good. As an encouragement to you for that purpose, I will try and send you a new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. S. E. PRICE.

BALTIMORE, MD., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $5 for two subscriptions—one to myself, the other to the address inclosed. We both go for the pictures, because they are truthful representations of the old fabulous stories which ought to be held up to view and execrated by all people. I should like a fine, large picture for framing of the "Ghosts' Pilgrimage" that appeared two weeks ago. I hav the promis of five subscribers. Three are secured, and I am waiting for two more. No Liberal ought to be afraid of the pictures. E. LIVEZEY.

CLINTON, Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I could not very well do without my TRUTH SEEKER. I should be very sorry to see the pictures removed from the paper, as I believe picture ridicule teaches in a great many cases where sound logic fails. By all means let us hav the pictures. Please find inclosed $3.50 and extend my subscription for one year. I am more than willing to pay fifty cents extra for the pictures. When I reach Tacoma I am resolved to get one or more subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is impossible in this religious, superstitious town. D. M. ANGUS, M.D.

COSUMNES, CAL., Dec. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: To many thoughtful minds the pictures do seem rude and crude, and in one sense of the word Mr. James Parton is right. But the fact remains that the greater part of mankind gather more from one ludicrous picture than from a volume of logical matter. By all means retain the pictures if practicable, for there are some so constituted that they can only be reached by ridicule. Happy New Year to all contributors, and most especially to Mr. John Peck, whose contributions hav the genuin ring. Send the ANNUAL for 1890. W. C. SHELDON.

DALLAS, ARK., Dec. 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money for which please send the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890, and giv me credit with balance. I will do my best to get another subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think you are mistaken when you say some Liberals are so deficient in honesty that they never pay for their paper when you trust them. I think they are the same kind of Liberals that get so highly offended at Heston's pictures. I believe that a genuin Liberal is honest, and I know that anyone that just leaned a little toward Liberalism could not help but be more than delighted with Heston's pictures. Yours fraternally, C. C. MURPHEY.

ROCHESTER, MICH., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, one half for renewal, and the other for a new subscriber. Also I send twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. With reference to THE TRUTH SEEKER pictures, I would simply state, if some prominent Catholic or Protestant journal should take to "illustrating" its pages with, say caricatures of Ingersoll with a fool's cap on, addressing a group of drunken rowdies, or Thomas Paine with a huge, pimpled nose, sitting at a table loaded with whisky bottles writing manuscript for "The Age of Reason," or Voltaire on a bed in death agonies praying for the salvation of his poor soul, I should not consider such very convincing arguments, but rather a confession of want of better ones.

Yours truly, C. H. GREENE.

BRONSTON, KY., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.25 for two subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER and one ANNUAL for 1890. I fear that we are going to hav trouble in the family over the pictures. Some of the pictures do good and some do harm. You cannot please everybody. Be your own judge of which would be the better for mental freedom, pictures or no pictures. For my part, I vote to discontinue all the bad pictures and continue the good. It might be that the first page would afford ample room for all the good pictures. And then again, it might be that one really good picture once a month, that would show up the absurdity of some passage of scripture, would be still better. Let us at least not call each other names about the pictures.

I believe it to be a matter of fact that there is not a sensible man or woman on earth but is perfectly willing to believe that there is a personal god somewhere who hears the prayers of man and can grant or reject them. And farther, whether they are willing or not, if sufficient evidence of the above alleged fact is produced it will force conviction. I would like to see in THE TRUTH SEEKER frequent calls made on T. Dewitt Talmage and others for the absolute proof that there is a God who can and does answer prayer.

J. N. BROWN.

LANCASTER, WIS., Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 25 for my subscription and the ANNUAL for 1890. I hav been waiting in hope to obtain a new subscriber. I am almost eighty years old, and cannot read much any more, but still I feel I cannot do without the paper, for there are so many others that enjoy it. I hav taken the paper so many years that to do without it would be a great sacrifice on my part. The paper that came first, years ago, was very small, only one sheet, and now to see such a large paper is very pleasing. About the pictures it does not make any difference, for the paper is as much pleasure to me without them. I would like to help obtain some new subscribers, but am too old and cannot do much going about. Respectfully, JACOB NATHAN.

OKETO, KAN., Jan. 1, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I forgot, when I wrote you last week, to remit for the ANNUAL. Please find inclosed twenty-five cents and forward me the same. Mr. Editor, I am with the majority of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers. I want you to continue the pictures. Those who find fault with them as being too hard on exposing the Bible must hav a little bit of religion lurking about their skirts, etc. Just as soon as you drop the pictures out of THE TRUTH SEEKER you will lose lots of old subscribers. The pictures are a lesson iu themselvs. There is more instruction to be got out of studying them than there would be if the space was filled up by anything else.

I am trying to get two or three of my neighbors to subscribe. They will soon. I hav two volumes of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am going to get them bound in book form.

JAMES BIGHAM.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M., Dec. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, which is for two subscriptions for one year, one for myself and one for the subscriber below-named. I hav one dear old TRUTH SEEKER come to me every week, and I find I must hav another one to lend out or giv away and the other to keep on file. I cannot keep in my head all they contain, so I keep them to refer to. If there is one hope I hav more than another, it is that you will be able to continue with the pictures. They are the cream of my life. I shall probably hav another subscriber or two for you in a little while. I like the music of the American Secular Union, and am going to start a Union here shortly or know the reason why.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, W. G. MORGAN.

SIDNEY, O., Jan. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav sent you five new subscribers, but it was some time ago. I enjoy the pictures, even if they are not of a very high order artistically. They do not shock me in the least, but they do shock some, and on the whole I believe the paper would do more good for the cause of freedom without the pictures; but I believe, too, that you would lose some readers by abandoning them.

A good plan to recruit Freethinkers is for the Freethinkers of a town to pay for a Liberal paper to the public library. THE TRUTH SEEKER would be better for this purpose were it not illustrated. The writer has followed this plan and is highly pleased with the result, one Roman Catholic being among the recruits. A paper without illustrations was selected. EMORY P. ROBINSON.

IPAVA, ILL., Jan. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: For the good of humanity, the promotion of mental liberty, the growth of reason, the elevation of our noble women, the extension of Freethought, and the increased circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, let the pictures be continued. They are the spice and the seasoning. We like our bread buttered and our meat salted. It is those who would like to see our bread fall "butter-side down" and our salt stolen that dislike the cartoons. Many men and women look and laugh at the pictures that hav not time to read. Then, again, we bind them into a book, making a beautiful pictorial edition that is very attractiv to children, from which they will learn many useful lessons by asking questions about the pictures. We must educate the children to think before the crawlers from the slime-pits poison their young minds. Send me one dollar's worth of TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS.

Yours truly, C. S. RANDOLPH.

DIVIDE, MONT., Jan. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. It battles nobly for the truth. It is true knowledge, correct education, that the world needs. To believe what is not a fact is of no profit or benefit to man, woman, or child.

One word about the illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They are just the thing. They present in definit shape the old superstitions that Christians believe, or profess to believe. When they see the illustration the old idea is so ridiculous it makes them overflow with anger. Right here I will remark, it is man that is angry with man for his belief; the gods are not angry with man for an honest belief. My Liberal friends, I would say to you all, it is your early education that still lingers in the mind—your old Sunday-school tales that still linger with you. Mr. Heston has the true idea. He cannot illustrate the old Bible stories so as to make them more ridiculous than they really are. My experience in showing the pictures has been this: In one family where I hav lived, when I would get my TRUTH SEEKER there would be no rest until the wrapper was torn off and the pictures were examined. All my friends that look at my paper agree that the pictures take the cake. For myself, I will say, I study the illustrations first, and they are good.

Yours for a fact, J. B. THOMSON.

ST. NICHOLAS, PA., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I see by my son's paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, that in order to enable you to continue the weekly illustrations in it you must hav an increased list of subscribers, therefore I forward my subscription, as one not wishing to see the illustrations disappear, for I think they form one of the best features of it or any other paper—but more especially of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as it is advocating and disseminating "truths of a cause," as well as showing up the folly, hideousness, and absurdity of what is termed Christianity and religion. And these cartoons of THE TRUTH SEEKER, appearing weekly, hav an effect that the whole paper written could not produce, and are the means of enlightening many that would not take the trouble or time to read up, but more especially to read such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER. I send you also twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

R. B. PLATT.

ORANGE CITY, IA., Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: According to my way of looking at things, Liberalism had better throw up the sponge. In your editorials you claim that your subscriptions are not paid. If that is so, it is no more nor less than stealing, and any Liberal that will read a paper and not pay for it belongs rather to the shady side of the community. It seems all the Liberal papers go a-begging, except the Twentieth Century, and after THE TRUTH SEEKER has come around I expect the other every day. Taking the American Secular Union in consideration, I hav spent over $300 this year in the movement, which for a poor man is sufficient. However, inclosed find $5. I can spare no large amount, but will remit more in the course of the year.

Leave the pictures off. They are nice for us, but do harm to the propaganda, for a good many fools that would read the paper throw it down as quick as they see the illustrations.

DE LESPINASSE.

CHARLES CITY, IA., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to the pictures, I say, for one, let them be continued, and here is $1 for their continuation. And if you will put them in book form, count on me for one number and probably more. I am getting pretty well along on the journey of life—was born May 4, 1824—but while I can raise a dollar to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I shall take it. I hav raised three boys and one girl, and they will compare with any children of any member of the churches of this city, and I never sent them to any Sunday-school. I hav taken the grand old TRUTH SEEKER since it was first published by D. M. Bennett, and shall continue as long as I liv. I say, let us hav the pictures and no let-up on them. And if all who sanction them will send a dollar, or what they can, to help keep them going, they need not stop, but get larger. Why, it was the pictures in Harpers' that did as much to suppress the Rebellion as every paper that was published during the war. JOHN MAHARA.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and ANNUAL. Though I cannot send you a new subscriber, I will venture to giv you my opinion of the pictures. I think them an effectiv means of opening the eyes of Christians to the absurdities of the Bible. They are far more true to nature than the ones we commonly see of Bible characters, arrayed in robes of bright blue, yellow, scarlet, and purple. As a matter of fact they were doubtless a dirty, greasy, sorry-looking set, bearing a close resemblance to the figures presented by Mr. Heston. My only regret is that the pictures are so far behind the times in the way of artistic execution. The very Christians who hold the old Jews of the Bible in such reverence, and who are so loyal to Jesus the Jew, would not to-day eat at the same table or associate in any manner with a Jew. It is only dead Jews that they adore. The living ones they despise. As I am not a Jew, you will not think that these observations spring from personal feelings. WILLIAM KWURZEL, M.D.

NEW YORK, Jan. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to read that there are some of your readers who object to Mr. Heston's cartoons. It can not but hurt his feelings. He is a real genius by the way he shows up the absurdities of the Bible stories. Wherein exists the difference between his cartoons and Puck's and Judge's, which are well appreciated, except that the latter are colored? That the pictures repel some persons is simply an excuse. The same person will repel THE TRUTH SEEKER without any pictures. But I know most such persons will look at these pictures, after all, when not seen by anyone.

As most people, especially the Christians, are thoughtless readers of their Bibles, to them these stories never appeared so ridiculous as they really are and show to the eye. Would not an increase of fifty cents to the price of subscription cover the cost thereof? I for my part would be willing to pay the increase rather than miss these cartoons. Inclosed please find $2 for picture account. FRED. KOEZLY.

KIRKSVILLE, MO., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: If the illustrations can be kept up without loss to the company, I am in favor of their continuance. A. W. Shatford, in his objections to a part of the pictures, in the last issue, says, "I do not see any sense in them." Of course there is no sense in them, because they are founded upon Bible nonsense, which fact by the pictures becomes plain at a glance. Ridicule is about the only argument that can be wielded against the position of a bigoted Christian with any effect. The Christian class cannot consistently object to ridicule, as their leaders practice it, and their Bible is full of it. F. W. Peabody, of your city, through the last issue, says, "If Mr. Heston's pictures are to continue, my subscription will cease on the 1st of January next." If Mr. Peabody is a Liberal in the full sense of the term, he must admit that he was a little hasty or unthoughtful in the remark. However, I inclose $3 to fill the vacuum should it occur, for which please send your paper to the gentleman whose address is inclosed. WM. HART.

Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot agree with Friend Parton on the pictures. I admire the cartoons. They are splendid. They speak for themselvs. They show a great deal of superstition and ignorance in the so-called inspired word of God. No, Friend Parton, it is far more honorable to be a man than to be a Christian. Christians hav persecuted to the exact extent of their power, and always will. They are the inventors and makers of instruments of torture, dungeon and chain, rack and thumbscrew, and the Holy Inquisition. The only instrument that now remains is slander. I hav been for the last two days trying to solicit subscribers, but all that I get is slander. "No, I would not read that paper if I had time to read it." But they can find plenty of time to slander the sacred dust of Thomas Paine. Sunday the 15th the Baptist pope preached his farewell sermon, and in the course of his sermon he referred to Ingersoll's Oration on Roscoe Conkling, saying that Ingersoll said that he did admit that there was a place after death. That rang through the village like a thunderbolt. "Ingersoll has weakened!"

I hope the cartoons will continue, and that subscribers will not wait to be dunned for their subscription.

WILLIAM A. BENNETT.

DENVER, IA., Jan. 1, 290.

MR. EDITOR: You ask about the pictures. Don't, "for God's sake," let that awful Heston make pictures in your paper. Why, the one with Samson running down three hundred foxes is awful. I had to hide my paper and read it behind the barn by moonlight for fear my great-great-grandmother might see it. She would feel awful if she should see it. If my Christian neighbor should see it, I fear he might feel awful, too, and maybe stick up his nose at it. Do not put those awful pictures in your paper. They make the Catholics feel awful, and the Presbyterians, Methodists, and Baptists, and an awful lot of other folks.

"For Christ's sake" do not let that "quarter of a bushel" write any more letters in your paper; they make some folks feel awful. Do not let that latter-day saint John (E. Remsburg) prove that A. Lincoln was no Christian; he makes thousands feel awful. Do not let Miss Wixon entice the rising generation away from "our lord and savior Jesus Christ;" it makes many feel awful. In fine, do not print that awful TRUTH SEEKER any more (though my subscription has another year to run), for it makes the Christian world feel awfully awful, for fear it will put hell out and throw heaven in the shade. Don't, don't! you awful sinner; and besides, ladies who write "Mrs." before their own names, say don't. But send me your ALMANAC for 1890 if there are not too many awful pictures in it. M. FARRINGTON.

FORT WAYNE, IND., Dec. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4.25 to apply on my paper and for the ANNUAL for 1890. I hav been trying to get some new subscribers. About the pictures, I think they do a vast good, and especially with the young; and it is through the young we must expect to do the largest amount of good. Some may object to those illustrations, thinking they repel rather than attract. This may be so in some cases, but in the majority of cases they create mirth, and I tell you, a good hearty laugh is dreaded by a simon-pure Christian worse than the devil. Then another thing. Heston's ridiculous pictures of Bible persons are of such a nature that to see them once forever dispels that vail that theologians hav so long held over the features of these old Bible heroes, and once that vail is turned away and they behold the malignant and savage features beneath, as in the case of Moore's Vailed Prophet, instead of reverence there will be abhorrence. There has been a great amount of good done in this world by ridicule. That great Christian scourge of burning people for witches in Salem, Conn., was stopped by a laughable circumstance that made the affair so ridiculous that those pious old heathens could not proceed any further. I hav the history of this incident written in rhyme by a friend, and thinking that perhaps the many readers of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER would like to read it, I will send the pamphlet containing that and other poems to you, and if desired you may print it for the benefit of your readers.

J. S. FROST.

GREEN HILL, O., Dec. 29, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find renewal. You may put me down for one of your ANNUALS for 290. I think I will be able to get two or three to join with me when they are ready. I tried hard to get some to join with me in my renewal, but failed. I would like to hav the pictures continued. I think they are splendid, and undoubtedly doing good work. I would like to contribute something to their support. I will hav the paper either with or without the pictures. I would like to contribute something to the general fund to help our new president in the work he has mapped out. I think he means business. I think some hav been too harsh in their criticism. What he proposes to do is in my judgment all right. I know that Putnam, Remsburg, et al, are doing good work in the lecture field. What we want now is to come up in the rear with petitions to our legislatures and Congress demanding of them legislation in favor of some one or more of the Nine Demands. And we want to take such fellows as the trustees of Girard College and play the mischief with them with the law. All this, and more, President Westbrook proposes to do. I do think he has mapped out a good campaign, and hope he will be successful. Let's giv him a chance, and help him all we can, and convince the people that there is something more in Liberalism than mere talk. For that is what a great many people in this part are beginning to think, and I must confess I had almost come to that conclusion myself. ENOOH WIOKERSHAM.

EUREKA, CAL., Dec. 17, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read Mr. J. Parton's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 7th in regard to the pictures. He writes: "People who like them ought to be religious. They are capable of nothing better." Were those sentences written in a fit of insanity, or has Mr. Parton arrived at his second childhood? No man of sound mind could write such nonsense. Mr. Parton is likely one of those weeping philosophers who consider it a crime to joke and laugh and look at the bright side of nature, but he is far from the mark when he sets himself up as a model for other people. If he does not like the pictures he could hav said so without giving such ridiculous reasons for it. I am confident R. G. Ingersoll would not write to you in that strain. The pictures, no doubt, repel many Christians who, but for them, might read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and on that account they may more or less retard its circulation, but to say that those who like them are only fit to be religious, is sheer nonsense. I am in love with the pictures illustrating the Bible; and I hav preserved every one of them. The pictures on the front page hav less value to me, except the one where the tigers are howling at the statue of Bruno, which I hav had mounted and framed. What a pity that Liberals who hav acquired fame in the prime of life, should ruin their good names in old age by becoming dogmatic! Mr. Parton says by inference, that anyone who disbelieves or derides the Bible is capable of nothing better than to be a Christian.

Elmina writes in response to an article in which some heroes had been praised: "Had those heroes no mothers? It is to the mothers the praise belongs." Why not stretch that reasoning a little farther and ask, Had those mothers no fathers? By going far enough we would find that all praise belongs to Adam. It grieves me when I see remarks like these from the pens of those I had learned to respect.

I think the writings of J. H. Wood, of Detroit, Mich., totally erroneous. But enough of this, lest an avalanche descend upon my head, and I, who fear neither God nor devil, may be worsted by some weak-minded mortal.

Fraternally yours, ROBERT GUNTHER.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Dec. 5, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find money for $25 worth of books and pamphlets, and in addition to that amount the subscription price of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER for two years to Mr. Thomas Goddard and myself—a copy to each address as at present. I hav been taking and perusing THE TRUTH SEEKER for fifteen years last September. I hav read it from some time in the spring previous to that period when our dear old Brother Bennett edited it at Paris, Ill. I am now at the age of fifty-eight, after being a believer in Christianity from the age capable of accepting any religious doctrin up to the age of twenty-one, when I joined the Baptist church and affiliated with the same from 1852 to 1867, at that time discarding the dogma of endless hell torment, and, in consequence of getting rid of this barbarous belief, was summarily excommunicated. After groveling along in Universalism for some three years, and by a close study of the Bible, being convinced that it was not a book calculated to elevate the human family to a proper status of civilization, I finally evolved into the light and life of Liberalism, and can say that I hav derived more knowledge, and consequently more pleasure, from reading THE TRUTH SEEKER than I ever did from reading the Bible, or the theological works I ever read, which were many, during all my life. I do not feel at this late day that I can well afford to do without the mental sustenance I gain from the perusal of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has become such a welcome guest and a household necessity. In regard to the discontent we see from some of our good brothers and sisters: I certainly do greatly admire Brother Burnham and Sister Severance. I hav learned to look on them as noble workers in Liberalism. I am sorry they can see no good in our endeavoring, as much as in us lies, to elevate those who are struggling toward the pinnacle of universal mental freedom, such as Dr. McGlynn, who is so near out of purgatory, and also Chadwick, Savage, and Clifford, who are yet a few strata below McGlynn, but, nevertheless, hav aspirations and need little more leaven to resurrect them to kingdom come (I mean to stand erect in Liberalism). To accelerate this nothing could be more beneficial than to come in contact with such characters as compose our annual congress. When I read the proceedings at first, I caught myself taking exception to having exponents of Christianity aiding us in our efforts to emancipate ourselvs from religious tyranny, but, on a more mature thought, I found myself on the side of charity. I now see no compromise with error in the matter whatever. The case, as I now look at it, is similar to that incident in the life of the noble philanthropist, Thomas Paine, when he jeopardized his life in the effort to save the king. His idea was to destroy priestcraft and kingcraft, but to preserve the life of both king and priest. In like manner we shall never regret doing all we can to save as many Christians as possible while we are engaged in demolishing their superstition, and building on its ruins truth and justice to all men, women, and children. I hope the individuality of those who are controling the Secular Union is of such strength that they will lose nothing in their endeavor to lift those who are struggling to free themselvs from the inconsistent doctrins of the church. Wishing all may work together for good, I bid the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER farewell for a while. Fraternally, WM. A. THOMPSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

An Arab Saying.

Remember, three things come not back;
The arrow sent upon its track—
It will not swerve, it will not stay
Its speed; it flies to wound or slay.

The spoken word, so soon forgot
By thee; but it has perished not:
In other hearts 'tis living still,
And doing work for good or ill.

And the lost opportunity,
That cometh back no more to thee,
In vain thou weepest, in vain dost yearn,
Those three will nevermore return.

Story of a Fly.

CHAPTER I.

Once upon a time there was a little fly. This fly had lots of brothers and sisters and his name was Quick. One day, when he and his brothers and sisters were playing together, Quick and one of his brothers disagreed about dividing some sugar they had stolen. Quick thought he ought to divide the sugar because he was the youngest, and Spry (that was the name of the other brother) thought he ought to divide the sugar because he was the oldest. All of Quick's brothers and sisters joined in with Spry because they did not like Quick very well. "Well," buzzed out Quick, for he was quick-tempered, "if you don't let me divide the sugar, I'll go and get some more of my own, and bring it back, and I'll not giv you any either." "We don't care for the old sugar, do we?" This was addressed to the others by the oldest fly. "No, we don't," buzzed out all the flies at once, "and, what's more, we can get all the sugar we want without his help." "I may be gone for months, maybe years, and may never come back. I may get drowned in an ocean of milk; I may get wounded; I may commit suicide; I may get burnt up in a stove; you may never see me again. Shall I go?" said Quick. "We don't care a straw whether you go or not," snapped out some of the flies. "Of course we don't," said all the rest.

It was planned that he should start off early next morning, and although he got up early and was brave he hated to go and leave his brothers and sisters. When he stopped by the gate to bid them good-bye, the other flies turned their backs on him and said, "Go on, we don't care to see you stop before you get hundreds of miles away."

This made Quick secretly cry, but he put on a brave face and flew away.

CHAPTER II.

Quick flew on until he came to a large white house. "Here," said he, "I can get lots of sugar." There was a very kind-looking woman washing dishes as he went in. But alas, alas! he had no more got in the house when that kind-faced mistress drove him and a shower of other flies out of the door. This made Quick mad, to be driven out so soon, so he made up his mind to go around to the front door and see if he could not get in there. When he got there he saw to his great delight that there was a little girl in front of the door feeding sugar to a big dog. "Now," thought he, "is my time." But he had no more than lit on the sugar than the dog snapped at poor Quick and barely missed him, and he flew away with a torn wing. He did not try again there, and after that he was not so bold and more sensible. His next adventure was to come near getting drowned. The way of it was this: One day he was flying along, and looking in at an open window he saw a pan of milk and, what he thought, thick cream on top. "Here," thought he, "I can get a good drink of milk, for I am very thirsty." So in he flew and lit in the middle of the pan. But he had no more than lit before the cream gave way, for the milk had just been milked that morning, and that was about 10 o'clock A.M. How he got out of the milk he never knew, but in about two minutes he was on the clean windowsill drying his poor wet wings and body. At last he was dry and sat there a few minutes to look around at things, and then he flew away again.

CHAPTER III.

Quick got some sugar at last, and I will tell you how he got it. One day he was flying along and lit upon a screen door and saw a little girl's face sadly puckered up in the act of crying. Every now and then she would look down upon her feet, so Quick looked down also, and then he saw she had dropped some sugar, and he thought, "No wonder she was about to cry."

Pretty soon a young girl about fifteen years old came to see what the matter was with the "Pet." When she saw the sugar on the floor she took the broom and dust-pan and swept it up and threw it out of the door. And that is where Quick got the sugar. The "Pet" got more sugar and was happy.

Quick lost no time in gathering up the sugar and started home with it. One day as he was flying along on his journey he dropped it in some long grass. He had to hunt a long time, but at last he found it, and was very glad, for he thought he would hav to go and hunt for more. He picked it up and flew on with it. It was early in the morning and he expected to get home that same night, but a storm overtook him and the wind blew very hard. When the storm came he was at the edge of a small river and was afraid to fly across it for fear of getting blown into the water. He knew he would not get home if he did not go on, so he concluded to go along the bank and hunt for a bridge. He started off and was flying along slowly when he flew against another fly, and to his great surprise he saw that the fly that he had flown against was Spry, his brother. They were very glad to see each other; although Quick was proud, he cried, but Spry told him to dry his tears and to come along the bank a little farther and they would come to a bridge where they could cross and get home without delay. He said that his brothers and sisters had got uneasy about him and had sent him out to look for him. They reached the bridge and crossed over in safety.

CHAPTER IV.

As they were flying along our hero flew into some brush, and before Spry had time to turn around he saw his beloved brother lying on the ground senseless. As soon as he realized the situation he lit by the side of Quick and at one glance saw that he had fainted away. Spry lost no time in bringing some water from a brook near by, when Quick recovered from his fainting, but he said that one of his legs pained him dreadfully. When Spry looked at it he saw that he had broken it, and that he would hav to go to a fly's house near by and get help. He asked Quick if he was afraid to stay alone for a minute or two. Quick said very faintly, "No." His leg pained him so he could hardly breathe. Spry flew off as fast as he could, and when he got there he told his business and asked if they had a saw. They said they had. He asked them to get it and he would saw off a willow leaf and make a litter of it. When they got back to Quick he lay so still they thought he was dead, but when Spry spoke he opened his eyes, nodded his head, and then shut them again. Spry proceeded at once to fix the litter. He knew that if he could get him on it and get the help of two or three other flies he could get home, and then he would go and get their old family doctor and Quick would be able to fly around the room in a few days.

Spry spoke his thoughts and they all agreed, and in less time than it takes to tell it they were home.

Spry had sent a messenger before them, so the family were not taken by surprise. They had sent for the doctor as soon as they got the message, so he attended to Quick's leg as soon as he arrived. He was better in a week so he could move in bed. Not till then did he tell his adventures, and he never went off after any more sugar, for he never had any occasion to, and he never was selfish any more. When they offered him sugar to divide he would refuse, saying, "No, I do not wish to divide any more sugar." The sugar he got, he dropped when he flew against the brush. These experiences were a lesson to Quick, and I think he was never selfish again.

Rochester, Minn. LEAFFIE CLARK.

The First Wooden Clock.

E. A. Fenn, in the Allegan, Mich., Journal, says:

About the year 1800, there lived a sort of indolent, thriftless, unpromising young man by the name of Eli Terry. His birthplace was the same as mine, Plymouth, Conn. He sought the hand and heart of a Miss Warner, and was bitterly opposed by her friends on account of his inability to support her. Miss Warner was either a sister or a cousin of the late Mrs. Friend Ives, an old resident of Gun Plains, and grandmother of Leon and Fred Chichester. The Warners were of solid old Puritan stock and despised laziness, but, notwithstanding all opposition, they were married and set up housekeeping. Soon destitution and want were about all that seemed visible for future days.

Eli had no visible means of support, but spent his time sitting on a stump or block, whittling out a circle he struck with an old compass or sawing off bits of wood from some dead trees, and thus, day after day, his time was spent, and the general opinion was he was crazy. Want pressed so hard in the home that the wife, by urgent entreaty of her friends, had about made up her mind to return to her parents' home, when the fruits of Eli's whittling and sawing materialized in the first wooden clock ever made in America, and, I believe, in any country. It was readily sold to a neighbor for $30 and paid for in pork, flour, potatoes, other family necessities, and a little money, with which he bought tools to facilitate his work in further prosecution of clock-making. Another and another was made and sold readily as soon as completed. The foot-lathe and small circular saws were added, then men were employed, clocks more rapidly made and eagerly sought after, and Eli Terry began to accumulate. In the mean time he had made application for letters patent upon his clock, and about 1802 or 1803 built a small shop and commenced improving on his clock and construction of machinery and tools, and the foundation for a vast fortune was made which materialized in after years. Notwithstanding his unbounded benevolence, he became very rich. He died about 1845, at the advanced age of eighty-five years, beloved and respected by all who knew him, leaving a large family of grown-up boys and a number of grandsons, all very wealthy and all living in Terryville, Conn., controling nearly all the wealth of the place, which was invested in large manufactories for clocks and locks. It is worthy of note that not one Terry is left in that region and all their interests and investments hav scattered and gone into other hands.

News of the Week.

LEO XIII. says he will not quit Rome as long as he can cling to the Vatican.

ITALY has enacted a law depriving the clergy of all influence over charitable institutions.

IN the Senate on the 8th Mr. Morgan proposed the emigration of the negroes to Africa.

AT Berne, Switzerland, military are parading the streets to prevent a riot by striking printers.

FRANCE is considering the reundertaking of work on the Panama canal, and hopes to finish it in two years.

IT is reported that Portuguese hav hauled down British flags on steamers in Africa, and trouble is looked for.

ST. PAUL'S Episcopal church at Norwalk, Conn., is having a sad quarrel over insulting anonymous letters sent by its members to its pastor.

THE island of Malta, in the Mediterranean, and the Balearic isles near Spain in the same sea, are severally proposed as asylums for the pope.

DELEGATIONS from New York and Chicago on the 11th presented to Congress their respectiv claims to possessing the Fair, and that body will soon decide.

A HEAVY storm did much damage in Great Britain on the 5th inst. A Catholic paper takes pains to report that the Protestant church at Birr, Ireland, was struck and badly injured by lightning.

A NAKED man was caught running through Prospect park, Brooklyn, on the 13th, stabbing himself with shears. He said the Lord had commanded it. "Where do you liv?" was asked. "In heaven."

THE young brother of the Catholic murderer McElvaine who is awaiting execution, has been taken before the court for disobedience to his father, and sent to the Catholic Protectory, that he may be told that whatever he does will be forgiven by Christ, and he be installed in heaven.

ENEMIES of the new order of things in Brazil declare that the government is not a republic, and has not developed one republican institution; that it is composed of self-appointed men, and is a military dictatorship pure and simple. To this, however, the opposit side makes what seems to be a satisfactory defense.'

AT 3:30 on the morning of the 9th, women in a house beside the wall being built for the Throop avenue Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, were alarmed by hearing the wall crack in the high wind. They dressed and intended to leave, but concluded to remain, and at 4:30 they and their children were praying in fear at some unusually terrific blasts, when the wall fell and crushed the house, killing two persons and injuring several.

ON the 12th severe storms prevailed in the West. A tornado damaged St. Louis, wrecking two churches among other buildings; three persons were killed and several injured. At Brooklyn, a suburb of St. Louis, two churches were completely ruined. Through Illinois, Kansas, and Nebraska a blizzard did much harm. Mississippi also suffered from a wing of the storm. The Lord crowned his disapproval of churches by blowing down two at Sardis, Miss.

THE grip continues destructiv throughout Europe, and in the eastern part of this country and in Chicago. New York city deaths last week were 1,424, double the usual number. In Paris physicians noted that the grip affected the temperate more than the intemperate, and advised alcoholic drinks. The result was that in three days 1,500 persons were arrested in the streets for drunkenness, of whom 1,200 claimed to be simply following treatment for the influenza.

MISS FLORENCE GILLESPIE, of Chattanooga, Tenn., three months ago was pronounced to hav consumption, but evidently had some years to liv, helped by the comforts of a wealthy home. Some Christian Science relativs, however, carried her to Boston and forced upon her a remarkable treatment, consisting in waking early, working hard, and believing her disease imaginary. She died a few days ago. She had been obliged to get her own meals the day before she died, and was left alone that night. She said she could not understand Christian Science at all, but was trying her best to be obedient to her aunt.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

BLASPHEMY AND THE BIBLE.

BY C. B. REYNOLDS.

Price, 5 cents.

THIRD EDITION.

BIBLE MYTHS;

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

BIBLE MYTHS shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

THE

MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A COMPENDIUM OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

By WINWOOD READE.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill.—[Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—[Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity, a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—[New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—[Penn Monthly.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Gems of Thought.

When it shall be said in any country in the world, My poor are happy: neither ignorance nor distress is to be found among them; my jails are empty of prisoners, my streets of beggars; the aged are not in want, the taxes are not oppressiv: the rational world is my friend, because I am the friend of its happiness: when these things can be said, then may that country boast of its constitution and its government.—Paine.

In this world we never will be perfectly civilized as long as a gallows casts its shadow upon the earth. As long as there is a penitentiary, within the walls of which a human being is immured, we are not a perfectly civilized people. We will never be perfectly civilized until we do away with crime. And yet, according to the Christian religion, God is to hav an eternal penitentiary; he is to be an everlasting jailor, an everlasting turnkey, a warden of an infinit dungeon, and he is going to keep prisoners there forever, not for the purpose of reforming them—because they are never going to get any better, only worse—but for the purpose of purposeless punishment.—Ingersoll.

In the impossibility of reconciling the continual disorders of which the world is the theater, with the purpose of a deity replete with goodness, they hav trumped up a destructiv genius, imbued with wickedness, who conspires to render men miserable, and to overthrow the beneficent views of the eternal. This bad and perverse being they call Satan, the devil, and the evil one. By the aid of this imaginary being they hav been enabled to resolve all their difficulties; yet they could not foresee that this invention, which went to annihilate or abridge the power of deity, was a system filled with palpa e contradictions. In every shift, the priest invariably makes God the author of sin.—D'Holbach.

A God that cannot make a soul that is not totally depraved, I respectfully suggest should retire from the business.—Ingersoll.

SAMSON LOSETH HIS STRENGTH.

And she made him sleep upon her knees; and she called for a man, and she caused him to shave off the seven locks of his head; and she began to afflict him, and his strength went from him. And she said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awoke out of his sleep, and said, I will go out, as at other times before, and shake myself. And he wist not that the Lord was departed from him.—Judges xvi, 19, 20.

Equally uncreatable, qually indelible, equally imperishable, equally immortal as Matter is the Force bound up with it. United in infinit amount to the infinit mass of Matter, in most intimate union therewith, and like matter, it runs in an unresting never-ending circle and emerges from each mode or union exactly the same in amount as when it entered it. As it is an indubitable fact that Matter can be neither newly created nor annihilated, but only changed in form, so must it be accepted as an absolutely certain experience that there is not a single instance in which a force has been brought out of nothing nor reduced to nothing, in other words born nor annihilated. In all cases in which forces make their appearance they can be traced back again to their sources—that is, it can be shown out of what other forces or energies a given amount of force has been obtained directly or through transmutations. This transmutation does not proceed arbitrarily, but according to definit equivalents or weight-numbers, so that the minutest amount of force can no more be lost than the minutest amount of matter in the transformation of matter.—Buchner.

It is the crowning glory of our century to hav demonstrated the indestructibility and the eternal persistence of force.—Ingersoll.

Vol. 17. No. 4. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, January 25, 1890. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

A FEW ITEMS FROM THE FREETHINKING POET.

He hated hypocrisy, he tore its holy robe, and for the outrage hypocrisy did not forgiv him while he lived, nor has it yet learned to forgiv him.—Alexander Smith.

Notes and Clippings.

Owing to a lack of funds the "publication of documents of the American Sabbath Union for 1890" has been postponed. Good! May the Lord keep the Sabbatarians poor—for of course it is all the Lord's doings.

The papal encyclical is published. It is a lengthy document. It insists upon the duty of Catholics to follow papal doctrins with absolute faith and condemns those who profess Catholicism while discussing and criticising acts of the church.

The local Sunday bill for the District of Columbia was presented in the House of Representativs by Representativ Breckinridge, of Kentucky. The speaker referred it to the committee on education and labor, but by request it was afterward referred to the committee on the District of Columbia.

The fifth nativ Indian congress met in Bombay on Dec. 26th. Two thousand delegates were present, a few of them being women. On the same day there was a meeting of Mohammedans, presided over by the kasi, the chief officer of the Mussulman community, and a resolution was passed declaring the Mohammedans to be opposed to the Indian national congress.

The Toronto Mail says that the superiority of the public school over the separate school in Canada is made apparent by the results of the recent high school entrance examinations at Kingston. From the public schools sixty-one candidates went up, of which number fifty-two passed. From the separate schools only eight candidates were sent up, and of these but one passed. Archbishop Cleary should learn from this record what it is that makes ambitious Roman Catholic parents restiv under the clerical rule to which the separate schools are submitted.

The value of exempted property in Montreal reached in 1888 the grand total of $19,131,920. Of this amount over $5,000,000 related to Roman Catholic benevolent (not church) property. A very strong feeling is undoubtedly beginning to assert itself, says Secular Thought, both in Ontario and Quebec against the system. Says a contemporary: "It is time that a change should be introduced. These exemptions are not in keeping with the requirements and progress of the age, and we hope that the necessity of doing away with them will make itself so strongly felt that opposition to the abolition of a very large proportion of them will no longer be raised."

There is a visible decline of the anti-Semitic spirit in Europe, says the Jewish Times. The latest proof of this is the dissolution of the German National Union, of Vienna, on the grounds that its anti-Semitic agitation disturbs public order and tranquillity. The emperor of Austria has on several occasions commanded the authorities to protect his Jewish subjects when endangered, and the legislation of the empire has been favorable toward them. In France the attempt of the author of a notorious anti-Semitic book to raise a storm of indignation against French Israelites has been a sad failure. The Jewish citizens of the republic exert a powerful influence on the destinies of the nation, and the efforts of bigots and fanatics fail in diminishing it. Enlightened France of to-day will not disgrace herself by inaugurating a crusade against the Jewish citizens who hav done and are doing so much to increase her prosperity and power. In Germany the Stoecker gang hav almost gone out of sight, and we hear only occasional wails from their anti-Semitic citadels.

A Jewish woman in Philadelphia made complaint recently before a magistrate that she had been taken by her husband before a rabbi and constrained to accede to a decree of divorce under the Hebrew law. The couple had lived together for fourteen years, and the husband's only motiv for his course was that he desired to marry their servant-girl, Dora Goldbeck, with whom he had already been living on terms of intimacy. He offered his wife $600 and some furniture if she would agree to a separation, and by threats forced her to consent. Then he married the girl, and the latter subsequently refused the legitimate wife access to her husband's house. A Hebrew lawyer of this city states that the custom of granting divorces without regard to the laws of the commonwealth prevails especially among the Russian Jews, of whom large numbers hav in recent years emigrated to America. In Russia the rabbis are granted legal jurisdiction over this subject, and when they come to this country the rabbis still continue to exercise this jurisdiction, not considering the difference between the Russian government and our own. The decree is written in Hebrew and a copy given to each of the parties, who suppose it to be a valid and absolute divorce. In consequence there are many bigamous marriages and large numbers of illegitimate children among these ignorant Hebrews. These Jews are very much like other religionists, especially the Roman Catholics and the Mormons; they put their religion above their allegiance to civil law.

The Ottawa correspondent of the Herald writes: "There is probably a good deal of racial antipathy and religious bigotry in the agitation which the Jesuit estates bill created in the populous and wealthy province of Ontario, but there is no denying the fact that the agitation is led by men who are both able and moderate, and they can certainly point to serious and objectionable political facts to justify their position. While the law recognizes and encourages the perpetuation of two languages in the Dominion and while tithe-collecting by process of law is permitted in Quebec and Roman Catholics are allowed state-aided schools in Ontario distinct from the general public schools, there never will be peace, and until all citizens, irrespectiv of creed or nationality, are put on the same footing before the law the Dominion will continually be torn by factional and sectional hatred. The situation is a peculiar one. Both political parties are fearful of offending the people of the French province, who are far readier to desert party at the dictates of their political, but still more of their spiritual leaders than their English confrères are. The church can make or unmake politicians in Quebec. The representation of that province of sixty-five members in Parliament can at any moment be solidified in defense of her peculiar institutions. The English-speaking representativs, on the other hand, seem prepared to sacrifice the country itself in the interests of party. Thus it is that Quebec—and when I say Quebec I might as well say the hierarchy—virtually rules the Dominion."

The Proposed Educational Amendment to the National Constitution.

In your paper of April 20th, which I hav just had the opportunity of perusing, I notice your logical and sensible reply to Mr. J. M. Brown, of Texas, in reference to the Blair Educational Amendment bill, and, while your arguments against its adoption are solid and reasonable, I would desire, with your permission, to enter my protest on another ground. I will quote, however, an argument of yours as the basis of my remarks. You say, "But well intentioned people will find, if this amendment ever becomes law, that the less does not include the greater, and that the ceremonials of the Christian religion would shortly follow the introduction into our schools of its principles. Tailing on after the principles would come the doctrins, tenets, beliefs, and observances, without which Christianity is but a skeleton of no great beauty or vitality." Permit me to say to you, and to, perhaps, nine-tenths of the advocates of this unconstitutional amendment, called the National Reform party, that Christianity cannot be taught separately from, or independent of, its doctrins and observances. It is the doctrin and observances that constitute it Christianity, in contradistinction to paganism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, etc. The real principles of the Christian religion are the doctrins and observances. It is utterly impossible to teach the principles without teaching doctrins and observances, or, as I would prefer to call them, the ordinances. You cannot teach the principles of mathematics, or the science of arithmetic, without teaching numeration, addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, etc. These are the fundamental principles of the science, and without them it is not, and cannot be called, the science of arithmetic. Nor can you separate man from his skin, muscles, nerves, arteries, bones, etc. It is his peculiar form, constituent parts, and organism that constitute him the particular species of animal that he is. I know full well that nine-tenths of the clergy of to-day suppose that they can teach Christianity without teaching doctrin and ordinances, but I contend that it is the peculiar doctrin, and the particular ordinances, that constitute it Christianity, and not Buddhism. It makes no difference in the present argument whether the principles, or, in other words, the doctrin and ordinances, of the Christian religion, are, by the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, considered unreasonable, absurd, or impracticable, or even impossible and positivly false. I am contending simply that the "principles" of the Christian religion and its doctrins and ordinances are one and inseparable. As you intimate, or, in substance, assert, "without them it is but a skeleton."

It is dead or inert as a skeleton, but I can hardly call it a skeleton, for that has a form and an organization so far, while Christianity, without its principles, i.e., its doctrin and ordinances, is not at all discernible, it does not exist in any recognizable shape. Now, in order to sustain my position, I will assume, what you will admit to be reasonable and proper, that we must appeal to the Bible, particularly the New Testament, as the rule of evidence in determining what Christianity proper is. I should be ashamed to concede that what has been claimed as Christianity by the church of Rome and others, is the Christianity of the New Testament.

I should be forced into the rankest Infidelity if I was compelled to believe, and to indorse, the cruel, bigoted, bloodthirsty, and devilish system of religion that exhibited itself in the Inquisition, on Bartholomew Eve, and also in England, in Massachusetts, and elsewhere, where men and women hav been burnt, strangled, shot, imprisoned, whipped, and exiled for the exercise of religious or secular views differing from the church holding the reins of government at the time.

I mean the New Testament Christianity which it is proposed to hav taught in the public schools in the United States. All that we can know, or at least all that these so-called National Reformers can know, of what constitutes the "principles of the Christian religion," must be gathered from the teachings of the author of the system, and which system is explained in a book, or in a series of books, which it is claimed were written by men who were personal hearers of what he taught, and were eye-witnesses of his example, or his practice, of the principles taught by him. What he taught, what he did, and what he commanded his immediate followers, or disciples, to teach and to practice, must be called the "Christian religion," and nothing else is entitled to the designation, or has a right to claim to be Christianity.

I doubt if there is a Protestant or Catholic to be found anywhere who will not admit that the doctrin of Jesus Christ is the soul, or life, or energy, and the foundation of the "Christian religion." Or who will claim that there is such a thing as the Christian religion separate from, and independent of, the doctrin of Christ?

Well, then, I inquire, can we find in the New Testament a clear, positiv statement as to what constitutes the doctrin of Christ? Or I will put it in this shape as a proposition thus: The principles of the doctrin of Christ, i.e., "the principles of the Christian religion," are plainly stated and clearly enumerated by one who claimed that the doctrin which he taught was revealed to him by the author of Christianity himself, and that he did not learn it from anyone else (Gal. i, 11, 12). Now, if I prove this point, i.e., that this individual clearly states what the principles of the doctrin of Christ in the Christian religion are, then does it not follow that these things must be taught in the public schools providing Congress shall enact a law requiring that that shall become, in due form, the law of the land? So that when the proposed constitutional (or rather the unconstitutional) amendment is adopted, the following principles of Christianity must be taught. Now what are they? I will quote from Paul's letter to the Hebrews (vi, 1, 2): "Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrin of Christ, let us go on to perfection, not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works of faith toward God of the doctrin of baptism, and of the laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment."

Not only does Paul call these "the principles of the doctrin of Christ," but he repeats the idea by exhorting the Hebrews to not "lay again the foundation" of that doctrin, which he enumerates as (1) repentance, (2) faith, (3) baptism, (4) laying on of hands, (5) resurrection of the dead, (6) eternal judgment. Now, I submit to every professed believer in Christianity (and to every Freethinker who will admit the simple proposition that the teachings of Christ, and his duly commissioned embassadors, should be considered Christianity if anything should be) that these six principles at least must be taught in the public schools, if the Blair amendment succeeds. I will now select but one of these principles to call attention to a matter of extreme difficulty that will arise hereafter among the school-teachers in their efforts to carry out the law. I refer to "baptism." That it is preëminently a first principle of the doctrin of Christ, I will now briefly show by stating, 1. That John the Baptist taught it, claiming that God sent him to do it. 2. Christ demanded baptism of John and was baptized by him; declaring it to be his duty. 3. Christ commanded his apostles to go and teach all nations, and to baptize them. 4. They taught that it was necessary (in connection with repentance) for remission of sins. 5. They even re-baptized those who had not been properly instructed, or who had been baptized by some unauthorized person. 6. They taught that it was essential to salvation (See Matt. iii, entire; xxviii, 19; Acts ii, 38; xxii, 16; xix, 3–5; 1 Peter iii, 20, 21). Having seen the importance of this ordinance, can we not discover that it at least must be taught in the public schools? But behold, Christians (?) can never agree as to the mode of its application. At least two millions in the United States will insist that baptism can be performed by immersion only, and is to be administered to adults only, and to children old enough to understand its signification, design, and effects.

About four million others insist that sprinkling a few drops of water on the head is valid baptism, and that babies can receive the ordinance as well as adults.

The two million immersionists will not now send their children to Sunday-schools where sprinkling is taught, nor will they fellowship at the "Lord's table" those who hav not been immersed, so important do they consider the mode to be. Will these people—who, by the way, are quite prominent in this amendment business—submit to the teaching of sprinkling as one of the principles of the Christian religion in the public schools? They never will. Will the sprinklers submit to the teaching of immersion as the only true or scriptural baptism? By no means. What then? Why, either that both positions, contradictory and irreconcilable as they are, must be impressed on the minds of the children, creating in them a spirit of discord and confusion, doubt and unbelief, or a compromise must be reached in which baptism must be left out of the list of "principles of the Christian religion." Can that be done? Can they agree any better on the subject of "faith?" Not at all. Can they agree on the "laying on of hands?" Why, bless your heart, Mr. Editor, there is scarcely a denomination that believes or practices it except in the act of ordination; whereas, in the days of Peter and Paul it was practiced in connection with the reception of the Holy Spirit (Acts viii, 15–19; xix, 6). And Christ taught it as essential to the healing of the sick, and the apostles practiced it for that purpose. Will these six million Protestants ordain by the voice of an ecumenical council that this principle of the doctrin of Christ shall be taught in the public schools when they do not preach it in the pulpit or teach it in their Sunday-schools or practice it in their churches? It is not to be expected for a moment.

Can they agree as to the resurrection of the dead? They do not now as to the time nor the manner nor the class involved. They might agree to hav the children taught simply that the dead will be raised; but it will not do for a thinking youngster to ask many questions on the subject, or the teacher will tell him that it is one of the "mysteries of the kingdom" that he must not pry into. Can they agree as to "eternal judgment?" Well, they never hav as yet. Oh, but we can all unite on one principle! they cry. Indeed, and what is that? Why, we can all teach "repentance" alike. We can hav the children taught not to lie, steal, kill, swear, etc. Very true, but could not all that be taught under the head of "virtue and morality," and not simply as a "principle of the Christian religion?"

Of course in these arguments I leave out the Romanists, whom it is intended by these reformers to taboo entirely. In fact, that they are "had in mind" is as plainly to be seen as that they want the Christian religion taught. The amendment, in fact, is the child of "Orange" parentage. It originated with the most pronounced of Rome's enemies. Suppose it prevails—i.e., becomes a national law? It would mean that the Roman Catholic faith shall not be taught in any form or degree in the public schools? The "principles" of the Roman church are not considered to be the "principles of the Christian religion" by these so-called reformers. The Romanists comprehend it fully. Yet they could favor the bill, and why? Because, first, they understand that it will lead to a rescinding of the second article of the Constitution, which they want badly to be taken out of the way. Second, they confidently expect, and they boastingly declare, that the time will soon come when they will be in the majority in every school district in the country. They expect to control the school boards and elect the teachers in the public schools everywhere, and these, being Roman Catholics, will teach what they consider to be the "principles of the Christian religion;" or, in other words, the Catholic religion. Can it be prevented under the amendment? In one way only, and that is by Congress clearly and plainly declaring what shall be taught, and no more nor less, as "the Christian religion." And it will then hav to go farther, and say that such and such things shall not be taught. In other words, it must positivly formulate a creed. And when that is done that creed will be the national religion, in spite of fate. It will be as complete a union of church and state as ever existed. The Romanist can giv the measure a hearty support even now, when its Presbyterian "horn" is clearly seen by them, although supposed to be indiscernible to Roman eyes. I say it can and will help the thing along. Because, when the creed, although Presbyterian now and aimed against that of Rome, is once formed and a national religion is once made, not only possible but an accomplished fact, the Romanists expect ere long to be in so strong a majority that they can alter the creed and make it strictly a Roman Catholic one. But again: if no creed is adopted by Congress, then each teacher must be allowed to teach his or her conception of the principles of the Christian religion, and this leaves the Romanist a free swing to teach, of course, what his master at Rome defines as the "Christian religion." But says one, the Romanists are in the minority as yet, and may be for years to come. Very true, and in view of that fact, now let us see what move that church will make on this National Reformers' chessboard.

Now, mark it well. If they do not assist the constitutional amendment on the foregoing ground, they will not oppose it, for this reason, viz.: If a religion different to theirs is to be taught in the schools, and theirs condemned and opposed, and they be forbidden by law to teach their faith in the public schools, they well know that they will then hav the most reasonable of grounds to withdraw their children from the public schools and to establish independent and denominational schools, and that they will be justified in refusing to support the public schools, and if compelled by law to support them, that they could justly claim a division of the school fund, and that on these positions they would hav the sympathy and support of all the Liberals in the country, and indeed the sympathy of every lover of fair play and square dealing in the country, even those who dislike the doctrins and hate the course of that politico-religio body. Now, it is evident, to every true American at least, that no religion, save that of "doing unto others as ye would that they should do to you," should be allowed in the public schools. I do not know whether anyone else thinks as I do, but I assume three positions: first, either that the public school system should be abolished entirely, and all left to educate their children as they can and as they please; or, second, that every parent or guardian of a child should be compelled by law to send the child to the free public schools, and that in these schools there should be no religion taught in any form whatever. Third, that inasmuch as a majority of the people of the United States seem to desire the simple reading of the Bible, a committee of five representativ men be appointed from the Protestant churches, and a like number from the Catholics, and from the Jews, and from the Freethinkers, and Spiritualists, who should make a selection of chapters which could be read with interest and profit to the children, and which would not teach anything except "virtue and morality." However, I cannot see what necessity there is for any scripture reading, or any religious exercises, to be employed in the public schools. Christian parents certainly can giv their children sufficient religious instruction at home, or they can get it in the Sunday-school. The children of Infidels or pagans will not be benefited, as these Reformers design should be the case, for the simple reason that their parents, who disbelieve the Bible, will counteract the teachings learned at school, and they will do it "out of spite." I mean that if their children are compelled to listen to what they believe to be fabrications, they will make greater efforts to teach their children to disbelieve the Bible, and thus prevent them from being deceived, as they think.

The Jews would take especial pains to teach their children at home that Jesus Christ was an impostor, and not the true messiah, if they knew that scripture was being daily read in the schools, designed to exhibit their blindness and unbelief in the matter to their children. Pride of opinion, and a spirit of resentment for having an offensiv faith taught their children against their will, and because their children would be led to look upon them with distrust and suspicion, because of their supposed blindness and folly, would cause them to make special effort to cause their children to close their ears and steel their hearts against the teaching of the Bible; whereas if it was not read at all, the children in multitudes of cases would hear nothing said against the book at home. I claim to be a minister of the gospel. as taught eighteen hundred years ago. I believe in primitiv Christianity, or the doctrin of Christ, as taught by himself and his apostles, and therefore I am not a pagan, nor an Infidel, nor a Romanist. Now, I know that if either of these systems were taught in the public schools by authority of the law —as it is now proposed to teach modern adulterated or milk-and-water Christianity—I say, I know what I would do: and that is, I would take every opportunity, and adopt every lawful measure, in my power to counteract what I would consider pernicious teachings; and I would prepare my children's minds to withstand the errors taught at school, and I would counsel the children to not listen to what was being taught, or at least to disbelieve what they heard.

I concede the same right to the Infidel, the pagan, the Romanist, and everybody else who would honestly think that I did not teach the truth if I should teach what I consider to be the true faith in the public school. If these National Reformers teach their children at home as they should do, if they really believe what they profess and desire their children to so believe, they should be content with that and let other people teach their children their faith. And if any parents are not capable of teaching their children at home and yet want them taught in any of the many ways called Christian, let them select the form they prefer, and send their children to the Sunday-school or that particular form of faith. I do not see but that every principle of the Christian religion can be fully explained to the understanding of any intelligent child in three months of weekly teaching at the Sunday-school, and it therefore does not require an every-day teaching for years in the public schools. The whole scheme is sectarian, blind, intolerant, foolish, and un-Christlike. The movement is unchristian and anti-American. There is no Christ in the matter at all. If Jesus Christ was on earth to-day and was permitted to hav a voice in the matter, he would repudiate the movement from first to last, unless he has radically changed since he declared that his kingdom was not of this world, i.e., it was not a worldly or political government. Of course, these people believe that they are inspired by the Holy Ghost in this matter. They think they are doing God's service and are honoring the Lord Jesus Christ, but they are sadly mistaken in all these thoughts. They simply "know not what they do." They will not win a soul from Infidelity by the movement, but they will increase its numbers and intensify its power and influence tenfold. They will create a spirit of bitterness, yea, of hatred, toward Christianity as understood commonly to-day, that will spread far and wide among the rising generation. In fact, I honestly believe that it will lead to a reënactment of the scenes that were witnessed in France one hundred years ago.

These parsons who by their Sunday Rest bill, and Constitutional Educational amendment, etc., are endeavoring to force their paganized and papalized Christianity down unwilling throats, in order to fill their empty churches on Sunday, will discover when it is too late that they will hav no churches to fill. And many of them will perish in their burning edifices, or I mistake greatly the temper of the hundreds of thousands of liberty-loving men of America. But I wish to ask one favor of the readers of your paper, and that is, I entreat them not to think for a moment that the spirit of God has inspired this movement; or that the gospel of Jesus Christ could ever lead to intolerance, persecution, or worldly-mindedness, arrogance and pride. If that gospel, or primitiv Christianity, was taught and practiced to-day, and God's spirit really dwelt in the hearts of professed Christians, these good fruits would be seen on earth, viz., "Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, and temperance." A Christian of olden times said, "The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men; apt to teach; patient, in meekness instructing those who oppose themselvs; if God perchance should giv them repentance to acknowledging of the truth." But what are the professed Christians of to-day seeking to do? Trying to unite the church and state, and to reënact the scenes of the Middle Ages, when a religious political power, ferocious as a wild beast, and figurativly represented as such, ignorant, hot-blooded, and with bitter hatred toward those who were said to be in error, burnt and beheaded, fed to wild beasts, starved to death, and tortured in every form strong men and delicate women, because they did not and could not conscientiously believe as the power did. These people are doing their best, if not to resurrect that beast, to make an image or likeness of him. I am not an Adventist, but seem to hav quite good grounds for supposing that persecution will come from this so-called National Reform movement. I believe that the spirit of persecution as bitter as ever animated Rome dwells in the bosom of many of that party to-day, and when Romanism and Protestantism unite to force the observance of Sunday as a day of rest and religious worship, the two horns of the beast of Revelation xiii may be developed. The chief obstacle that stands in the way of this Antichristian movement developing a murderous propensity, is, that it may fear a tit-for-tat movement on the part of a numerous body who do not profess to walk by the law of Christ, that teaches non-resistance. But, however, this Antichristian combination may persecute with bonds and imprisonments those who will not resist it, and boycott those whom it may fear to lay its hands upon.

I will close with calling your attention to a prediction by Joseph Smith, the so-called Mormon prophet. You may take it for what you consider it worth, however. He predicted that a time would come when a civil war would rage in the United States, when men would lift their swords against their neighbors, not as in the conflict between North and South, but a war between neighbors, such as could occur between religious bigots and Freethinkers, or between Catholics and Protestants.

But I hope that the friends of liberty of thought, speech, and religious conscience can retain their freedom by the ballot, and not be called upon to defend it with the bullet; but I feel confident if they are not vigilant and activ, they may be forced to decide the question at the point of the sword yet. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Do not trust any church with political power, for if so, the rights of others will surely hav to suffer. I represent an unusually liberal body, but I would not trust the reins of government in its hands; and I am sure I would not put them in the hands of others, who hav exhibited an intolerant spirit in this and other lands.

Equal Taxation.

AN ADDRESS WRITTEN FOR THE TAXPAYERS' ASSOCIATION OF BALTIMORE CITY.

My object in speaking before you this evening is to urge upon this association some practical methods whereby every citizen shall bear his just proportion of taxes, and eschew exemptions of every character, except the property owned by the state.

Gentlemen, we hav had enough of beating around the bush on this subject of taxation; now let us come boldly up to the work and show that we mean business. I am informed by a gentleman who has had much experience in assessing property in this city and county, and has given the subject much thought throughout our state, that the burden of taxation rests on less than one-half of our citizens—that is to say, if the millions of property exempted, and the other millions not returned, were assessed and taxed, our taxes would be far less than half of what they now are, both in the city and throughout the state. I hav no doubt of the truth of this, and it only requires a little thought and a little looking into the matter to see this in all its glaring injustice.

Gentlemen, the time has come for action. And I want to urge this action here to-night, that justice may be done to us all in this tax-ridden city and state. If our legislators are so blind to the rights of our people "through political corruption" (as one writer has said) on this subject, as to favor class legislation by giving these exemptions the sanction of the law, then let us raise a fund to carry our grievances into our courts, and perhaps up to the higher courts of the United States.

A sad picture indeed we hav before us, if our legislators are to become the tools of craft and cunning, by imposing these inequalities of taxation upon us, and by not giving the people relief when and where it exists. And you all say it does exist; you all complain of the inequality of taxation; you maintain that some are paying double what they should pay and others comparativly nothing! But talk is cheap and amounts to very little without action. We must assault the bulwarks of injustice; we must raid the temples of superstition and ask what right they hav under the constitution and laws of our state, and of the United States, to claim exemption from taxes. We acknowledge this to be a free country; the Christians can erect their temples; the Mohammedan his mosque; the Chinaman his joss-house; the Israelite his synagog; the pagan his temple to worship his deity through the medium of the sun or his god Buddha. They all hav their rights under the Constitution, but there are no exemptions granted any of them from the payment of taxes in our Constitution, and none of these institutions having the protection of the state and government hav the right to claim any exemption from taxes. The Constitution explicitly declares that no man shall be compelled to support any church or any form of religion whatever. He is free to worship where he pleases, either in Christian or other churches, or in the "great temple of nature," the house not made with hands, but whose maker and builder is the god of heaven. I speak reverently and with emotion.

It is written, the foxes hav holes, the birds in the air hav nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head! Shall we then be compelled to pay taxes to support these costly sectarian edifices, erected by the wealthy people of our land, and tax the poor and lowly habitations of men to keep them up? Why, gentlemen, it is base injustice, and we should demand that it shall cease, and that they be compelled to pay their full share of taxes, according to their value, as other property is assessed and taxed. This first—then hunt for the personal wealth of the other millions that hav slipped through our assessors without being assessed or taxed. Let justice be the rallying cry of this association.

I contend that there is no justice in any kind of exemptions; besides, exemption is a positiv injury to all religion. It detracts from its influence and confirms all that are not connected with its temple worship in their resolves to hav nothing to do with a system that neglects to pay the state for the protection it receives.

Besides, the history of the civilized world teaches that power in a church is danger to the state; wealth in a church is poverty for the people, and privileges for the church are wrong and injustice to the masses. And so our fathers evidently thought when they formed our wise laws divorcing church and state. They had seen the evil results, many of them having fled from the tyranny and oppression of these institutions, resolved to free mankind in this new country from the burdens imposed in the old. I feel impelled to express myself strongly on this point. You behold your bill of rights and state constitution violated, as well as the Constitution of the United States; you behold the greed for power which this exemption encourages. Vast institutions and property are taken up by this hierarchy, and this dead hand already counts its wealth by millions in this fair land. And shall it go on without paying taxes? Next we may hav the Cromwellian cry, "That the earth is the inheritance of the saints," and with power to enforce it, the liberties of our people will be gone. This is no fiction; things are tending in this direction; history repeats itself; the greed for power is the same, and by the course pursued we are playing into the hands of this power. Although their institutions are exempt, and although they stand in the attitude of mendicants, they hav the insolence or audacity, or both, to claim a part of the money collected by taxation, which they do not pay, to further their own objects, and at the same time they demand exemption from taxation, thereby becoming beneficiaries of the state and leeches of the public purse. Every man has the undoubted right to entertain his opinion in regard to this world or the next, but he should do so at his own expense and not at the cost of those who differ with him. We hav a secular government, and the divine master instructed his disciples to render unto Cæsar the things that belong to Cæsar. And so we say taxes are Cæsar's. They belong to the state, and common honesty and justice to the state and its people demand that they should be collected and paid by all the institutions and corporations in the land. And this is what I contend for. Other phases of this question hav been discussed and enlarged upon, this only approached cautiously by two or three members of this association.

Gentlemen, I know that there are abler minds than my own in this association, more accustomed to oratory and debate, and as well, or, perhaps, better posted on this special subject of taxation. But hav you the courage of your convictions? I hear many of you say that all of this property of which I speak ought to be assessed and pay its taxes, and yet you adopt no measures to accomplish it; you seem to stand aghast. Is the fortress impregnable, that you fear to scale its walls? When your rights are invaded do you fear to resist the wrong and assert the right? You ask for lower taxes and an increase of the taxable basis, and how can this be accomplished unless we bring in all exempted property and stop this class and privilege legislation? You may lecture here till doomsday; it all amounts to nothing without action. We must appeal to the courts and hav these exemption acts declared invalid, and when backed by the public sentiment of a vast majority of our people, the victory over this injustice will be accomplished—"a government of the people for the people." We claim not a government for a privileged class; not only the secular, but the divine lawgiver, also, says to the church: Pay your taxes. As I hav said, when the great master was applied to by his disciples, he said: "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." That is to say of churches, Although you hav dedicated them to me, the taxes are Cæsar's. They belong to the state. Churches belong to the material realm, not to the spiritual; they are temples built with hands wherein he declares he dwelleth not. No good, valid reason can be given why churches should be exempted. They are all erected to further the interests and objects of sects; all sectarian in their character; many of them fine and costly for ease and comfort of their members, and to accommodate private persons in their own peculiar views, with which the state declares it has nothing to do, yet leaves all free to think as they choose. And when the mind is divested of all superstition and reason, and experience and observation become the guide, you will see more clearly the relations these exempted institutions and corporations bear to the state.

Suppose any of them was raided by a freak of public sentiment (or otherwise a mob), by the free play of freemen's spirits, as our lamented Henry Winter Davis said when Knownothingism alarmingly prevailed here in Baltimore, and this class of property was injured or destroyed; what would be the consequence? I tell you, they would muster some of you learned attorneys forthwith in their service, and claim heavy damages from the state and get them, although they stand in the attitude of beneficiaries to the state and pay no taxes, and contribute nothing to support the state for the protection they claim. Think of it. Suppose you should go to a fire insurance company after you had sustained a loss by fire, and claim insurance when you had never paid the premium; or to a life insurance agent, when you had never taken out a policy. These companies very justly would laugh at you, and probably say you were insane or a fool. Yet this is precisely the attitude of these exempted institutions to the state or municipality where they are located, claiming protection without contributing a cent to support the civil power that protects them. And shall we continue to be the dupes of these institutions that pay no taxes for the benefits and protection they receive. I say here to-night they should be outlawed or compelled to pay their full share of taxes, according to the value of the property, to the state or municipality that protects them. We must be in earnest in this matter of exemptions, and not submit to let these corporations and institutions usurp prerogativs and claim that to which they are not entitled by any fair and honest view of the case.

Gentlemen, if any exemptions should be allowed, the order of things should be exactly reversed; progress is the order of the day; new ideas and methods are coming to the front, and justly too. The religion of humanity in place of dogma and creed and the Thirty-nine Articles, and if any property should be exempted, it should be the poor man's home. I repeat it, the poor man's home; a home that is supported by daily toil. Exempt every four to six room house occupied and owned by its occupant; in the city of Paris, in France, all houses where the rental does not exceed one hundred dollars are exempted; and there are over twenty-four thousand houses occupied by the poorer class exempted. Encourage a poor man to save his little earnings and get a home, and when he gets it, let him know that it is his; that its humble portals are sacred and debarred from the rapacious tax-gatherer; that he is not obliged to pay out of his scanty earnings to support scheming politicians, rich corporations, and costly church edifices and other institutions. We must not hav the humble home sacrificed to any of these. We need to help men to get homes; we need to supply human wants and necessities. Behold what they are doing for the race. See how the people are being cheated and defrauded into support of churches by their being exempted from taxation. And with men out of work; with women toiling at twenty-five cents a day, or less; children half fed and half clothed, these luxurious institutions abound as public burdens on many of our citizens.

Happily for the race, the light of science and truth is onward; we must not despair; the oppressions on the human race (brought about by these very institutions I hav arraigned) are being lifted. France, Italy, and Brazil are casting off this incubus that has hitherto oppressed them, and a gleam of light is said to be shedding its rays on that benighted, superstition-ridden country, Spain, that under Mohammedan rule many centuries ago was the beauty and pride of the nations, and may she come forth under the banner of freedom and toleration and join her sister republics, and those of the world.

I want it understood that I am not making these remarks in the prejudice of any religion. I advocate, however, the religion of humanity; dogmatic religion is another matter; yet I accord the right to all to advocate their views and religious tenets, as well as the Agnostic, who does not pretend to know about that which is not known. And we ask again that they shall be made to pay their taxes to the state or municipality that protects them in all their varied views and beliefs.

The churches must take their place in the world the same as other institutions; that is, on their merits, and be subject to the same criticisms by an enlightened and intelligent people. The days of unquestioned childish belief are over. If we are told a foolish story that contravenes the known laws of nature, and all the experience and observation of mankind, we deny it; we ask for the truth, and want it, as founded "on the rock of ages," which is the great and enduring temple of science, established by scientific research and the experience of the race.

A Look at Politics.

The capitulation of our new president to the pope of Rome, following so soon after the disgraceful toadying of Grover Cleveland to the great Italian fraud, ought to admonish the American people that the corrupt politicians are bartering away their inheritance to an avowed enemy of a free press, free speech, free thought, and our free common schools for the education of the masses—all of which are palladiums of our civil and religious liberties, guaranteed by a republican form of government.

When Harrison was nominated by the votes of Jim Blaine's friends a fear spread over the country that in case of Harrison's election Blaine would manipulate the wires for the interests of the Roman Catholic church. This just and reasonable fear arose from the fact that Blaine had the confidence of the Jesuits, by which he made inroads into the Catholic vote in 1884. Hence it was but natural to fear that in case of Harrison's election the pope's influence might become as potent in dictating the administration of public affairs as it had been under Cleveland. And it is even so. The pope's minions are getting in their work in a way that brings "blessings" from Rome. Under the circumstances it is more deeply humiliating than the pitiful, obsequious toadying of Cleveland, because Cleveland had never masqueraded before the country in the cloak of extra Protestant holiness.

Cleveland invited two original Catholics into his cabinet, and handed the whole machinery of the government over to the pope's agents, by allowing the various departments in Washington to be filled up with the pope's spies; and to a very great extent they are there yet, and will stay. Cleveland sent a "jubilee" present to the pope, and, in every way except physically, he crawled on his belly to kiss the pope's toe, in the name of the people of the United States. He sent a government vessel to greet and escort to our shores the pope's Italian priest, sent to deliver a hat to Cardinal Gibbons. He allowed Atkins, his commissioner of Indian affairs, to farm out the Indian children of the reservations to Catholic schools, under pretense of "education," and opened the treasury vaults and shoveled out the public money with a free hand, to pay for having the young Indians crammed with catechism and taught how to count their beads and say "Hail Mary" according to program. He attended the laying of the corner-stone of a great papal university at Washington to teach the rising generation that our public schools are cesspools of iniquity not fit for educating the American youth—and to teach them that they must be obedient to the church, and take their politics, as well as their religion, from Rome. And to teach also, in the language of the pope, that "the pope by divine right hath supreme power over the whole world, both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs." He having thus sold out to the pope for Catholic votes to reëlect himself to office, it was quite natural that the St. Louis Democratic convention should be run by the pope's tools, and hence it was not strange that the temporary chairman was a Catholic, the permanent chairman a Catholic, the man who placed Cleveland in nomination for reëlection a Catholic, the man to second the nomination a Catholic, the man to propose "Old Bandana" Thurman for vice-president a Catholic, and a Catholic priest to open the show with prayer—in fact, everything was Roman Catholic at that convention, which was too much of a dose for the American people, and resulted in the election of General Harrison—only to wear Cleveland's papal mantle, and betray the patriotic, loyal sentiment of the nation by a sycophancy that is disappointing and alarming.

When the papal university was ready to be dedicated, Harrison led his cabinet to the banquet-room to see the pope's representativ occupy the seat of honor at the right of the pope's Cardinal Gibbons, while he—Harrison—was made to play second fiddler to "his holiness's" show. Then to further teach the papal doctrin that all kingdoms and rulers are subordinate and subject to the pope, the first toast was to honor the pope, and then the church and the bishops; and finally "Our country" took the refuse drippings of the papal banquet. And the president and cabinet, and nation, merely bowed to the snub and studied insult, with all due reverence to "his holiness."

Recently, when Harrison sent his appointment of General Morgan as commissioner of Indian affairs to the Senate for confirmation, the Senate laid the matter over until General Morgan could apologize or make explanation to pacify the pope's tools who had filed objections to the confirmation on account of some duty performed not in the interests of the "holy Catholic church." If the United States Senate does not submit to a Catholic bulldozing, and refuse to confirm Harrison's appointment, it will do better and different from what it did in 1885, when it was bulldozed to confirm Cleveland's appointment of a graduate from a whisky saloon in this city as Indian agent at the Green Bay agency in this country, and who is retained in office by Harrison against the interests and protests of the Indians and the public, because a Romish bishop forbids his removal—and this against overwhelming evidence that he ought to be removed, and the wish of the interior and Indian departments for his removal. It is a rank and clear case of capitulation to the pope. It involves the theft of a public Indian school, with a large patronage turned over body and boots to the pope for the propaganda of pagan superstitions and idol-worshiping ceremonies; besides over $15,000 a year to a private Catholic school from the public treasury, besides spoliation of poor "Lo" in many other ways.

"Look well to the West" as well as the East, especially the four new states, where papal votes were promised to elect administration candidates in exchange for whatever the pope's tools may demand. When an extra session of Congress was talked up in the fore part of 1889, there was fear that the small margin then in sight would not be sufficient to organize and control both branches of Congress if an extra session was called before the four new states elected their quota. It was at this crisis that the Catholic bishops saw the opportunity to suggest that the Catholic vote might be handled to change both branches of Congress to Democratic. This only illustrates the Jesuit cunning and intrigue that is constantly threatening our institutions through the corrupt office-seeking politicians in both parties. This game worked in the four new states, notwithstanding, with the possible exception of Montana, all had been strongly Republican in spite of the Catholic vote cast against the party, which counted for nothing under a bishop's threat, and the great anxiety to make a sure thing of the coming elections. Thus Jesuit diplomacy secured a new grip on the "powers that be."

Let the people of the new states, as well as all others, keep a sharp eye open for the working of the papal machine—especially as to Indian agents and other points touching the pope's interests, and they may discover how they hav been sold out to the pope.

This being but a brief showing of the country's relation to the papal power by the betrayal of trading, corrupt political demagogs, is it not time for the people to begin to seriously consider a remedy? And what remedy is in sight but for the patriotism of the nation to organize a new party—a voting party—to admonish the traders in Catholic votes that other votes may be necessary to secure office? There may not be enough who consider principles of more value than party to elect their ticket on the first trial. But if such a party could show a "balance-of-power vote" the traders would pay some deference to principles in selecting candidates, and be more cautious in selling out the country for Catholic votes. The infamy of this traffic in the two past presidential elections has originated numerous secret and semi-secret patriotic organizations, all of which ought to become an organic union to save the country from the impending danger of papal intent and influence to destroy our common schools and undermine our civil and religious liberties. Let us prepare for 1892.

W. S. WOOD.

Shawano, Wis., Jan. 15, 1890.

Which is the To-be-Damned Party?

As the season approaches when the occupants of the orthodox pulpit deem it necessary to pour out an extra tirade of defamation and misrepresentation on Thomas Paine and Freethinkers generally, consigning them all to hell and eternal damnation, I thought it might be well to investigate the matter a little and see if they are not damning the wrong party. When we ask them by what authority they consign us to such uncomfortable quarters, they refer us to Mark xvi, 16: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." Fortunately, the next two verses very kindly tell us how we may know who possesses this "saving faith." "And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." Now, mark the language. "These signs shall follow them that believe." These results are not restricted to any class, time, place, sex, or race, but apply to one as much as another, and absolutely and unqualifiedly to each and every one that believes. Now, is there a Christian in Christendom who can do any of these things? Can Talmage or Moody or Spurgeon or Sam Jones handle cobras or drink strychnine with impunity? Of course not. Well, if there is not a professed Christian on earth whose faith is followed by any of these signs, it is clear that they do not possess the genuin article of faith; and, whatever may await the rest of mankind, they will certainly be damned.

Christ, in his Sermon on the Mount, Matthew v–vii and Luke vi, explains very clearly the principles on which he will judge mankind. At the close of this sermon he says: "Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man who built his house upon a rock; and the rain descended and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house and it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock. And everyone that heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man who built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended," etc. And it fell, etc. According to orthodoxy, he that hears and does shall be saved, and he that hears and does not shall be damned. What, then, are those sayings? One of them is: "Swear not at all; but let your communication be yea, yea, and nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." I hav been astonished at the fact that nearly every orthodox Christian whom I hav heard testifying in the courts of Pennsylvania, where they had the choice of the simple affirmation, which Christ approved, or the oath, which he most positivly forbade, deliberately took the oath. Another saying is: "Ye hav heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye," etc. "But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite you on the right cheek turn to him the other also." Did you ever know of an orthodox Christian who obeyed that saying? I never did, but often hav I heard them denounce the Ladds, Ballous, and Garrisons, who did do it, as Infidels and fools. As these same sayings were a "stumbling-block to the Jews and to the Greeks foolishness," so they are at least equally so to the modern Christian. Again, he says: "Love your enemies; do good to them that hate you," etc. Do the Christian nations obey these sayings? Let the ten or twelve million soldiers who stand ready drilled and equipped with the most destructiv weapons that Christian ingenuity can invent, waiting to sweep each other from the face of the earth and wrest from each other their property, answer. Let the $25,000,000,000 of war debt of Christendom answer. They do not, either as nations or individuals, obey them, or admit their obligations to obey them. So, too, with the saying, "When thou prayest thou shalt not be as the hypocrits are, for they love to pray standing in the synagogs and in the corners of the streets; . . . but thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door pray," etc. This command, also, the leaders of the Christian world treat with unqualified contempt, and like their prototypes, the Pharisees and hypocrits of the older time, parade their religion, their long public prayers and their charities, before the world, and do it even more offensivly and disgustingly than did those old-time Antichristian hypocrits.

Again, Jesus says: "Lay not up for yourselvs treasure on earth." "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." "Therefore I say unto you, take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on." "Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" "And why take thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field," etc., "shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" "Therefore," he repeats, "take no thought, for after all these things do the gentiles seek." Thus he enjoins poverty on his followers. He said of himself that he was poorer than the foxes and the birds, not having "where to lay his head," and that "the disciple was not above his master"—it was "enough that he be as his master." He said, "Blessed are the poor, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," and "Woe unto you that are rich, for ye hav received your consolation." "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven." When the rich man died, he went to hell, though nothing is charged against him but his wealth. While the poor, penniless beggar went directly to heaven, his poverty seeming to save him. The "young man in the gospel" lacked but one thing of getting to heaven, and that was poverty. He was good, kind, and lovable, but he was rich, and therefore had to be damned. In harmony with this idea were the commands: "Giv to everyone that asketh you. If they take away thy cloak, let them hav thy coat also. From him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again." So the early Christians took joyfully the spoiling of their goods. These teachings necessarily consigned the Christian to poverty, with heaven as compensation, while the rich man's wealth was balanced by hell. But our D.D.'s tell us that Jesus did not mean what he said. To say that he used language in a sense contrary to its plain, natural signification, knowing and designing that honest hearers and readers should be misled by it, is to call him an unscrupulous deceiver, which we cannot allow. We are compelled, then, as honest men, if we accept the record at all, to regard Christ as an honest, earnest reformer, whose teachings plainly antagonized, and were understood to antagonize, nearly every accepted and popular theory and practice, both secular and religious, of his time, for which he and his followers were hated, despised, and persecuted by the sanctimonious, pious priests and hypocrits of his day, just as Bruno, Paine, Bennett, and millions of others hav been hated, persecuted, and despised by the same class of pious priests and hypocrits of later times.

How appropriate it would seem on the final day for your garrulous Brooklyn preacher, when he finds himself relegated to the left hand among the goats, as he and his class most certainly will be if these sayings of Christ are correct, to expostulate in the language Christ said such men would use, and say, "Lord, Lord, hav I not prophesied [preached] in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? Did we not lay one cornerstone of our Tabernacle on Christ, and another on God? Did I not most publicly and frequently declare that I was a friend of God and Christ?" And for Christ to answer, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say? You hav eliminated from my teachings every unpopular, self-denying principle, so that instead of being poor, hated, and persecuted as I was, and as I said you would be if you faithfully preached and practiced my gospel, you were rich, loved, and honored by the world. In defiance of my commands you swore, you struck back, you hated and killed your enemies. Like the Pharisees and hypocrits of the olden time against whom I denounced the damnation of hell, you make long public prayers and make ostentatious display of your religion and godliness at every opportunity, and even wished to parade them before the world in your country's Constitution. Instead of not laying up treasure on earth and preaching my gospel freely to the poor, you made merchandise of what you falsely called my gospel, selling it to the rich, and amassing a princely fortune by the sacrilegious fraud. When I told you to take no thought for the morrow, you insured your property and your life. You dishonored me by justifying, in my name, slavery, war, and every popular abomination. You persuaded yourself and your followers that the broad road that the Pharisees trod to hell was the narrow path that led to heaven, thus insuring a common destruction. Therefore, depart ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." And there, in sorrow, we leave them. Peace to their ashes. And this answers the question at the head of this article.

W. W. WALKER.

The Catholic Church as Administrator.

Says a writer to Neues Freireligioses Sonntags Blatt, Magdeburg, Germany: The Italian government stirred up a real waspnest when it undertook the reform of charity institutions (Opere Pie). The clerical party raised a tremendous noise over the audacious meddling with the church's administrativ affairs. It failed, however, to scare the government, and a bill regulating the use of the Opere Pie funds introduced in the Italian chamber, has already passed the point of general debate. This bill aims at the useful application of money left by philanthropic people, and which, in the course of centuries, has become an enormous capital, the interest of which (one hundred and fifty million lires) is now-a-days principally devoted to all other objects than that of helping the poor, which was the intention of the testators, it passing down to the mysterious depths of coffers belonging to church and cloister, or into the never-filled pocket-books of clerical administrators. Twice before did Depretis attempt a reform and useful application of these absolutely lost riches, but it was reserved for the never-failing courage of Crispi to undertake and successfully finish the investigation of this case, in which not a few politicians of importance are financially interested, and against which the Vatican raised a storm of petitions.

What has the investigation brought forth, in spite of the Vatican's cry of pain at being "robbed" of its best financial sources in Italy? That of those one hundred and fifty million lires which every year flow into the religious institution over two-thirds are applied to churches, cloisters, costs of administration, Peter's pence, etc., while of the rest only a small percentage is really used for works of charity. There is, for instance, every year set apart in the books—in the books, understand—thousands and thousands of lires for the maintenance of pilgrims' hospitals which perhaps were in their place centuries ago when people used to walk barefooted to Rome, for "catechumen schools," homes for "exposed infants," "outfit for nuns," etc.!

It is naturally very disagreeable for the church, whose stomach could so nicely accommodate and digest the Opere Pie, to see such large sums of money applied to help the poor and all kinds of charitable institutions.

Poetry in Law.

Last week Colonel Ingersoll was defending a man in a breach of promis case. Here are some of the little bits of poetry that appear in his address to the jury:

When a man gets to a point where he'll lie, there isn't much choice of subjects.

You must take it for granted that men of ordinary sense do not act like extraordinary fools.

I'll go as far as anyone to whip naked through the world the man who deceives a good, pure, and confiding woman.

A marriage without love is immoral. I don't care how many forms you go through, I don't care if all the churches in the world, united beneath the dome of heaven, filling all the air with incense, pronounce them wedded, if that sweet perfume called love does not arise there is no marriage.

The woman who marries a man because he is rich, for a title, or for office, place, or power, is not a virtuous woman, and the man who marries a woman for any such reason is not a virtuous man, but a contemptible wretch.

She knew that he could obtain a divorce only by perjury and fraud, yet she was willing to marry him, and be divorced only by papers and perjuries, and not by facts.

Epithets are so cheap that you can make money on lies at fifty cents a hundred.

People who are fond of music are sometimes dangerous.

There is no evidence that her heart was ever quickened one-hundredth part as much as it would hav been by the sudden appearance of a mouse.

If I got such love letters as hers, I'd keep 'em until summer and then carry 'em in my pockets hot days.

Oh, what an orator is love! What honeyed words run over the rose of his lips!

When another commits a fault, it is a great dead tree half decayed, bare and hideous, but when we do it ourselvs, oh, my God! think of the reasons, climbing around it like a thousand clinging vines, covering with soft loveliness every branch and twig, turning it into a beautiful object.

His love letters are sincere and good; who would hav thought there was so much blood in the old man?

She was coldly and placidly correct, as correct as a crystal pane upon a frosted window.

I think any woman in the world is repaid for an ordinary breach of promis by being taken to hear Wagner's music.

"Tristan," that Mississippi of melody, flowing deep and strong, with hundreds of little tributaries bursting over the rocks into flowers of foam.

Every heart is like a theater in one respect; there are certain effects produced, but you don't want everyone to see all the ropes and pulleys.

THE combined influence of the Jewish writings [Old Testament] and of that ascetic feeling which treated woman as the chief source of temptation to man, caused her degradation. . . . In the writings of the fathers, woman was represented as the door of hell, as the mother of all human ills. She should be ashamed at the very thought that she is a woman. She should liv in continual penance, on account of the curse she has brought into the world. She should be ashamed of her dress, and especially ashamed of her beauty.—Lecky.

THE French government, about the middle of the eighteenth century, seems to hav reached the maturity of its wickedness, allowing if not instigating religious persecutions of so infamous a nature that they would not be believed if they were not attested by documents of the courts in which the sentences were passed.—Buckle.

TAKING the care of people's lives out of their own hands, and relieving them from the consequences of their own acts, saps the very foundation of the self-respect and self-control which are the essential conditions both of individual prosperity and of social virtue.—Mill.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

CHAPTER XV.

RECAPITULATION AND CONCLUSION.

Character of Christian Testimony—Summary of Evidence Adduced in Proof of Lincoln's Unbelief—Douglas an Unbeliever—Theodore Parker's Theology—Fallacy of Claims Respecting Lincoln's Reputed Conversion—His Invocations of Deity—His Alleged Regard for the Sabbath—The Church and Hypocrisy—Lincoln's Religion.

In the prosecution of this inquiry, the testimony of one hundred witnesses has been presented. The testimony of twenty of these witnesses is to the effect that Lincoln was a Christian; the testimony of eighty is to the effect that he was not.

Of those who hav testified in support of the claim that Lincoln was a Christian, ten admit that during a part of his life he was a disbeliever in Christianity, while not one of the remaining ten disputes the fact. If he never changed his belief then he died an unbeliever. Did he change his belief and become a convert to Christianity? It devolves upon those who affirm that he did to prove it. Hav they done this? They hav not. Their attempts hav been in every instance pitiable failures. The unreasonable and conflicting character of the testimony adduced refutes itself. When was he converted? No less than five different dates hav been assigned. One witness states that it was in 1848; one, that it was in 1858; another, that it was in 1862; another, that it was in July, 1863, and still another, that it was in November, 1863.

The remarkable character of the statements recorded in Chapter I—remarkable when compared with the statements given in the preceding ten chapters, and not less remarkable when compared with each other—may be variously accounted for. A part of them are based upon a false premis, an erroneous conception of what the term Christian means; a portion of them are merely the expressions of beliefs unsupported by actual knowledge; while a not inconsiderable share of them are the statements of those who hav knowingly and deliberately borne false witness. These witnesses comprise: 1. Those who do not know what constitutes a Christian—who confound Christianity with morality—who affirm that he was a Christian simply because he was a moral man. 2. Those who do not know what his religious views were, but who infer that he was a Christian because others hav declared that he was, and because of the frequent allusions to deity that occur in his speeches and state papers. 3. Those who know that he was not a Christian, but who believe it to be right and proper to lie for the glory of Christianity and the profit of its priests.

The testimony advanced in support of the claim of Lincoln's Christianity is, for the most part, the testimony of orthodox Christians—a majority of them orthodox clergymen. Dr. Holland, the chief of these Christian claimants, says: "The fact is a matter of history that he never exposed his own religious life to those who had no sympathy with it." This, so far as the later years of his life are concerned, is substantially true; and this very fact precludes the possibility of these witnesses being able to state from personal knowledge what his religious views were.

In refutation of this claim, I hav presented the testimony of those who were nearest to Lincoln in the confidential relations of life. I hav presented the testimony of his wife, the testimony of his stepmother, the testimony of his step-sister, the testimony of his cousin, the testimony of his nephew, the testimony of his three law partners, the testimony of two members of his cabinet, the testimony of his private secretary, the testimony of his executor, the testimony of four of his biographers, and the testimony of many more of his most intimate friends, both in Illinois and at Washington.

That he was not an orthodox Christian, as claimed, is attested by nearly all of the eighty witnesses whose testimony has been given; that he was not in any sense of the term a Christian, is proved by the testimony of a majority of them.

I affirmed that he was not religious in his youth—that he was a skeptic in Indiana. In proof of this I hav adduced the testimony of his step-mother, Sarah Lincoln; his step-sister, Matilda Moore; his cousin, Dennis F. Hanks; his nephew, John Hall; his law partner, W. H. Herndon, and his biographer, Col. Ward H. Lamon.

I affirmed that he was an Infidel or Freethinker during the thirty years that he resided in Illinois. In support of this I hav given the testimony of Colonel Lamon, W. H. Herndon, Maj. John T. Stuart, Col. James H. Matheny, Dr. C. H. Ray, W. H. Hannah, James W. Keys, Jesse W. Fell, Judge David Davis, Wm. McNeely, Mr. Lyman, Wm. G. Green, Joshua F. Speed, Green Carruthers, Squire Perkins, Judge Gillespie, John Decamp, James Gorley, Dr. Wm. Jayne, Jesse K. Dubois, Judge Logan, Leonard Swett, W. H. T. Wakefield, D. W. Wilder, Dr. B. F. Gardner, J. K. Vandemark, A. Jeffrey, Dr. McNeall, Charles McGrew, J. L. Morrell, W. Perkins, H. K. Magie, James Tuttle, Leonard Volk, Col. F. S. Rutherford, E. H. Wood, Dr. J. J. Thomson, A. J. Grover, Judge Nelson, and others.

I affirmed that he did not change his belief after leaving Illinois—that he was not converted to Christianity at Washington—that he died an unbeliever. In confirmation of this I hav presented the testimony of his wife, Mary Lincoln; of his private secretary, Colonel Nicolay; of his executor, Judge Davis; of his biographer, Colonel Lamon; and of his intimate associates, Geo. W. Julian, John B. Alley, Schuyler Colfax, Hugh McCulloch, A. J. Grover, Donn Piatt, Judge Nelson, and others.

Many of these witnesses simply testify to his disbelief in the Christian system as a whole without reference to his particular views concerning its individual tenets. Every statement of his unbelief as presented in Chapter V has, however, been substantiated by the testimony of one or more witnesses.

That he did not believe in the Christian deity, that he even held Agnostic and Atheistic views, at times, is proved by the testimony of W. H. Herndon, Colonel Matheny, Judge Nelson, Jesse K. Dubois, and D. W. Wilder.

That he was an Agnostic in regard to the immortality of the soul is attested by E. H. Wood, Judge Nelson, and W. H. Herndon.

That he did not believe that the Bible is the word of God is affirmed by Colonel Lamon, John T. Stuart, Judge Matheny, W. H. Herndon, Jesse W. Fell, Dennis Hanks, W. Perkins, Colonel Rutherford, and Chambers' Encyclopedia.

That he did not believe that Jesus Christ was the son of God is affirmed by Colonel Lamon, W. H. Herndon, Jesse W. Fell, Colonel Matheny, John T. Stuart, Jas. W. Keys, Judge Nelson, D. W. Wilder, Green Carruthers, Colonel Rutherford, Rev. J. Lloyd Jones, Chambers' Encyclopedia, and the New York World.

That he did not believe in a special creation the statements of Mr. Herndon clearly prove.

That he accepted the theory of Evolution, so far as this theory had been developed in the "Vestiges of Creation" and other writings of his day, is attested by the same witness.

That he did not admit the possibility of miracles is confirmed by the statement of Jesse W. Fell, W. Perkins, Dennis Hanks, and Mr. Herndon.

That he rejected the Christian doctrin of total or inherent depravity, William McMeely and Jesse W. Fell affirm.

That he repudiated the doctrin of vicarious atonement is sustained by the testimony of Jesse W. Fell, Joshua F. Speed, W. Perkins, and Colonel Lamon.

That he condemned the doctrin of forgivness for sin, General Wilder and Mr. Herndon both testify.

That he opposed the doctrin of future rewards and punishments, Wm. H. Hannah, E. H. Wood, A. Jeffrey, Jesse W. Fell, and Manford's Magazine all testify.

That he denied the freedom of the will, Mr. Herndon explicitly affirms.

That he did not believe in the efficacy of prayer is fully established by the evidence of Mrs. Lincoln, Mr. Herndon, and Dr. Gardner.

That he was a disciple of Thomas Paine and Theodore Parker is shown by the evidence of Colonel Lamon, W. H. Herndon, James Tuttle, Jesse W. Fell, Dr. Ray, Robert Collyer, the New York World, and Chambers' Encyclopedia.

That he wrote a book against Christianity is sustained by the testimony of Colonel Matheny, Judge Nelson, W. H. Herndon, Colonel Lamon, Manford's Magazine, and Chambers' Encyclopedia.

That Lincoln did not believe in the inspiration of the scriptures, that he did not believe in the divinity of Christ, that he did not believe in the freedom of the will, that he did not believe in future rewards and punishments, that he did not believe in the efficacy of prayer, that he was, in short, a disbeliever in Christianity, is also attested by the evidence cited from his own recorded words.

In connection with this controversy the significance of the following facts cannot be overlooked: 1. Notwithstanding the strong temptation to credit Lincoln to the popular faith; a majority of his biographers hav either declared that he was not a Christian, or hav refrained from affirming that he was. 2. The secular press, fearing to offend the church, has generally been silent regarding the question. When it has ventured to express an opinion, however, it has been to concede his unbelief. 3. The leading encyclopedias, such as the Britannica, Chambers', New American, etc., hav either admitted that he was a Freethinker, or hav made no reference to his religious belief. 4. In the Lincoln Memorial Album appear two hundred tributes to Lincoln, the greater portion of them from the pens of Christians. In but two of these two hundred tributes is it claimed that Lincoln was a believer in Christianity. 5. The "Reminiscences of Lincoln" contain thirty-three articles on Lincoln, written by as many distinguished men who were acquainted with him. In not a single instance in this work, is it asserted that he was a Christian. 6. In none of the leading eulogies pronounced upon his character, at the time of his demise, is it affirmed that he accepted Christ.

It is stated that during the last years of his life Lincoln held substantially the same theological opinions held by Theodore Parker. His own words are, referring to Parker: "I think that I stand about where that man stands." Where did Theodore Parker stand? The following extracts from his writings will show:

To obtain a knowledge of duty, a man is not sent away, outside of himself, to ancient documents; for the only rule of faith and practice, the word, is very nigh him, even in his heart, and by this word he is to try all documents.

There is no intercessor, angel, mediator, between man and God; for man can speak and God hear, each for himself. He requires no advocate to plead for men.

Manly, natural religion—it is not joining the church; it is not to believe in a creed—Hebrew, Christian, Catholic, Protestant, Trinitarian, Unitarian, Nothingarian. It is not to keep Sunday idle; to attend meeting; to be wet with water; to read the Bible; to offer prayers in words; to take bread and wine in the meeting-house; love a scapegoat Jesus, or any other theological claptrap.

If Lincoln was known to be a Freethinker, it may be asked why this fact was not more generally published and urged against him during the presidential campaign of 1860. The answer is easy. His chief opponent, Douglas, was himself a Freethinker. Stephen A. Douglas, like Abraham Lincoln, died an unbeliever. Like Washington, he declined the services of a clergyman in his last hours. The following is an extract from a monograph on "The Deathbed of Douglas," published in the Boston Budget:

When Stephen A. Douglas lay stricken with death at Chicago, his wife, who was a devout Roman Catholic, sent for Bishop Duggan, who asked whether he had ever been baptized according to the rites of any church. "Never," replied Mr. Douglas. "Do you desire to hav mass said after the ordinances of the holy Catholic church?" inquired the bishop. "No, sir!" answered Douglas; "when I do I will communicate with you freely."

The bishop withdrew, but the next day Mrs. Douglas sent for him again, and, going to the bedside, he said: "Mr. Douglas, you know your own condition fully, and in view of your dissolution do you desire the ceremony of extreme unction to be performed?" "No!" replied the dying man, "I hav no time to discuss these things now."

The bishop left the room, and Mr. Rhodes, who was in attendance, said: "Do you know the clergymen of this city?" "Nearly every one of them." "Do you wish to hav either or any of them call to see you to converse on religious topics?" "No, I thank you," was the decided answer.

Among America's most eminent statesmen none probably ever possessed a more logical mind than Lincoln. Judge Davis says: "His mind was logical and direct." James G. Blaine says: "His logic was severe and faultless." George S. Boutwell says: "He takes rank with the first logicians and orators of every age." In his funeral oration at Springfield, Bishop Simpson said:

If you ask me on what mental characteristic his greatness rested, I answer, on a quick and ready perception of facts; on a memory unusually tenacious and retentiv; and on a logical turn of mind, which followed sternly and unwaveringly every link in the chain of thought on every subject he was called to investigate.

Lincoln was once called to investigate the subject of Christianity. He "followed sternly and unwaveringly every link in the chain of thought" suggested by this subject, and the result was its rejection by him.

If he was subsequently converted to Christianity, it was only after a reëxamination and a thorough and exhaustiv investigation of its claims. This his friends positivly state never took place, and the circumstances associated with each and every period assigned for his reputed conversion confirm their statements. In 1848 he was a member of Congress, his mind absorbed with the novelties, the duties, and the aspirations that usually attend a first term in that important capacity. In 1858, and for years preceding and following, the great political questions of the day occupied his mind. He was engaged in a mortal struggle with one of the most powerful intellectual athletes of his time. He was contending with Douglas for a prize, and that prize was the presidency. He must be ever on the alert. He must crush his antagonist or his antagonist would crush him. Think of Lincoln sitting down in the very crisis of this conflict and engaging in the study of theology! In 1862, and 1863, the other years assigned for his conversion, he was in the midst of the great Rebellion, all his thoughts and all his energies enlisted in the mighty task of saving the Union.

That Lincoln was a Freethinker in Illinois, that he was for a time a zealous propagandist of his faith, that he was instrumental in making unbelievers of many of his associates, it is useless to deny. If he was afterward converted to Christianity, his friends were ignorant of his conversion. He failed to notify them of his previous mistake and warn them of their impending danger. If it could be shown that he renounced his former views and became a Christian, this fact would be one of the most damaging arguments against Christianity that could be advanced. As a Freethinker, he was one of the most tender and humane of men, ever solicitous for the welfare of his fellow-beings. Did Christianity transform him into a selfish, heartless being who coolly disregarded even the eternal welfare of his best and dearest friends?

Think of a man directing a friend to take a road which he afterward discovers leads to certain death, and then not lifting a finger of warning to save him from destruction, when it is in his power to do so!

The Freethinker will require no other evidence to convince him that Lincoln died a disbeliever than the fact that he once fully investigated this subject and proclaimed himself an Infidel. The mere skeptic who has no settled convictions—who has never examined the evidences against historical Christianity—may become a sincere believer in the Christian religion. The confirmed Freethinker never can, albeit a Thomas Cooper, a Joseph Barker, and a George Chainey may profess to. As Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson happily expresses it: "You may take the robin's egg from the nest in yonder tree, and so near is the bird to being hatched you may crack it with the edge of your nail, and the bird is free. But all your power, and all your patient fidelity, and all the mucilage and sticking-plaster you can put on it, will never get that birdling back into that little egg again. So complete is the sense of satisfaction, such is the feeling of freedom, which comes from once finding yourself, not merely out of these little sectarian names, but out of the name of the larger and grander sect, which is Christianity, that you will find when the egg is once broken, the bird is free forever."

From the church steward's standpoint, there is nothing so desirable as the early conversion of one who is destined to become rich. From the evangelist's point of view, there is nothing like the death-bed repentance of one who has become great. Had the bullet of the assassin not immediately destroyed consciousness, all these stories that we hav heard about Lincoln's conversion—the Edwards story, the Smith story, the Brooks story, the Willets story, the Vinton story, and the story of the Illinois clergyman—would never hav been invented. Instead of these we would hav the story of some domestic, or some intruding priest who saw him during his dying hours. Aaron Burr was kinder to the church than John Wilkes Booth.

But whatever the religious opinions of Lincoln were when he died, whether he had changed his belief or not, in view of the fact that he never thought enough of the church to unite with it, the frantic efforts of clergymen and church-members to claim him seem quite uncalled for, if not ridiculous.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

Woman at the Fore.

The Liberal, Freethinking women of the United States, under the leadership of Matilda Jocelyn Gage, propose to hold a suffrage convention in Willard's Hall, Washington, D. C., on the 24th and 25th of February, 1890.

This is a movement in the right direction. It has always been evident to my mind that "liberty, equality, and fraternity" could never be truly engrafted on the body politic of this country until the women awoke to the fact that they could never get any rights from God. Having guaranteed them none in his "book," he is not under any moral obligation to amend the original text to suit the convenience of the cause of "original sin." It is curious that womankind hav not discovered this before. But Talmage says they owe what liberty they hav to the Bible, and of course Talmage knows. That they hav "waited patiently about" for more liberty to be interpreted out of the original text of God's word has not been surprising, considering the amount of "faith" that most women hav in men and gods. Now that they are getting to hav faith in themselvs, there is some hope for them and hope for the world as well. For men, women, and children must all rise or fall together in the crisis of life. Theology and politics separate them but nature does not; and nature has long ago proved herself to be the stronger in the affairs of life. Whenever nature takes her place as the supreme ruler and God shares the fate of the calf-god that Aaron made, the world will take a wonderful stride forward. It seems that this good time is coming sooner than was expected.

This convention looks as if the women are tired of the old régime, and mean to look out for themselvs on the solid basis of natural rights. In "fighting it out on this line" they will be sure to win. But they "will not fight their battles alone." "The just God who rules in the affairs of men" having failed them, they will find plenty of just men to take his place. And one live, honest, brave, liberty-loving man is worth a skyful of such gods as the God of Abraham, and Moses, and Lot, and the jolly old boys of patriarchal days.

Let all the women of America who are free from the yoke of superstition and priestcraft take a note of this coming convention. Let as many as can be there. Let them go prepared to inaugurate a "long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together," not for women alone, but for the whole family—united humanity under one banner of "liberty, equality, and fraternity," with "liberty, science, and humanity" for their motto. And may I be there to see.

Use and Abuse of the Bible.

A Kentucky Correspondent of the Woman's Journal.

In studying the Bible I simply pursue the course that all church theologians take in studying the Bibles of rival religions, and look out for the bad as well as the good. The great majority of unlearned Christians study their Bible—if we may judge from their own admissions—purely to find everything inspired and consequently good. To the Bibles of other nations they deny all inspiration, and hence find everything bad.

My desire is to win the average Christian to a more critical and just method of study, even though, in this attempt, I run the risk of shocking him by exposing the wickedness of Peter or Paul, or by laying bare the uncertainties which all scholarly theologians acknowledge hang about the names of the biblical writers, the dates of their writings, and the reliability of what has come down to us as their utterances. It is the abuse of the Bible by its blind worshipers that I oppose, not its lawful use; and it is its abuse which first led men to teach Christian women that the fable of Eve had any bearing on their religion. It can be proved to be an innovation, hotly contested upon its introduction into the church. The first Hebrew scholar the church ever had—the learned Jerome—pronounced it a "myth." Clement called it an "allegory." No scholarly Jew ever believed it, as it is now taught, as an article of faith. Christ never made even the faintest allusion to it. Long after his death it was born of ignorance, and has since been nourished by superstition. Now, with the revival of learning amongst theologians, it is again unhesitatingly pronounced "a myth, whose origin is lost in the night of the remotest ages" (Lenormant).

Modern churchmen do not even pretend to prove that this story was originally Jewish, nor that it is an article of faith to believe Moses wrote it; on the contrary, even the most conservativ admit that there is no certainty at all about it. I will prove this by quotations from Dr. Daniel D. Wheden, for nearly thirty years editor of the Methodist Review, whose orthodoxy was never brought to trial by his church.

Writing of the results of modern study of the Bible he says:

> Evangelical scholarship has very generally concluded that Genesis is largely made up of pre-Mosaic documents. . . . Now, whether the primitiv documents of which scholars decide that Genesis or any other book was made up were originally inspired at all, or not, is not so important. . . . The text is mainly human, and in what proportion the human and divine are mingled is a problem not wholly soluble. We know that the text, as it stands, is, in many cases, incorrect; we are often unable to be sure of the perfect accuracy of the historic statements. . . . We hav inherited from ultra-Protestant Puritanism, perhaps, too mechanical a biblical theory.

Now, it is just this "mechanical theory" which, I believe, still keeps women in slavish submission in the church, the state, and the home; which hinders their noblest work in their own country, and hampers their usefulness abroad. The Hindoo woman, in perplexity at the contrast between our preaching and our practice, says: "You offer me an 'infallible' book which commands me, as the law of God, to obey my husband; but my husband commands me not to accept your book. How can I do both?" If she is an intelligent Hindoo, she knows that while, in her own country, many women, from remote ages, hav been eligible as rulers, and hav reigned gloriously over large provinces, in America it is considered a subject of ridicule even to mention the possibility of a woman's filling the position of governor of a state or president of the nation; and this fact stares her in the face, while she knows also that "the heathens" in China are proud of the long and glorious reign of their late empress, a remarkable woman. Although (as a result of having as few opportunities for education as do the thousands of illiterate women in our own partly civilized sections of country) few Hindoo women hav the opportunity to look on "our seamy side," yet many of them know as well as we do that it is a common sight (or was until lately) to see women and dogs yoked together, in the streets, drawing small carts, in Christian Germany, or working with men down in the coal-mines, in Christian England. It is ignorance everywhere that makes woman an easy victim; there is no strength without freedom, just as there is no power without knowledge. It is a sorrowful and amazing thing to hear a follower of Christ, in this enlightened age, quoting Peter as authority for woman—that very Peter who, according to history, was the most shameful moral coward of the ages, and yet, after his lie, told with cursing and swearing (see Matthew, Mark, Luke), presumed to turn round and call woman "the weaker vessel."

The example of Sara is the inspiration which the Mormon husband holds up before his wife to induce her, too, to acknowledge him as "lord" and giv him another wife, "even as Sara," etc. And we who uphold Abraham are helping to fix more firmly the yoke on our Mormon sisters' necks. For where is the consistency of glorying in Sara's obedience to her lord, and yet condemning the Mormon woman who can prove to us that Christian Peter still praised Sara for it, that Paul indorsed all womanly submission to husbands, and that no direct reference to her case in the New Testament taught that polygamy was a sin? Only those who set aside all other authority than Christ's Golden Rule can consistently oppose Mormonism and the subjection of the wife in Christendom.

This is a matter in which we women must judge for ourselvs, not pin our faith on our "preacher," who has no other sources of information than such as are open to us. "Seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened to you," meant, at the time it was uttered, "There are two kinds of knowledge, one of which cannot but be hidden from all those who are not interested enough to search for it personally." It was one of the earliest bishops of the Christian church who, mistaking this utterance, taught that there was one kind of instruction for "women and children and the simple," and another for philosophers. The trouble with some women—I might truly say with the mass of women—is that they confound the inner kernel of religion with the husks of tradition which obscure it. Christ said: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free," but the average clergyman says: "Ye shall know what I choose to make you believe, and thus I can hold the reins and keep you out of the vestry, or turn you out of my conference." But who shall say whether it is our indifference and want of thought, or their love of power, which is most to blame? They are the sons of women at whose knee, from their earliest childhood, they absorbed the teaching of Peter and Paul, which has been for eighteen hundred years so much more alluring to men than the teaching of Jesus.

The time is ripe for a Luther among women to complete the task only begun three hundred years ago; to follow his bold example in deciding what to accept and what reject. Every agitation of belief in old creeds is followed by an intellectual revival which prepares the way for a purer faith and a nobler freedom. It is want of faith in the highest that makes timid souls cling to beggarly husks. How can we hope to hav the masses of American women even know the meaning of the word "freedom," while they are content to sit "like dumb, driven cattle," and hear some inexperienced youth, fresh from a theological seminary, preach sermons to them about woman's bad example in bringing sin into the world? Not four years ago, in the largest and wealthiest church in a populous Southern city, I heard such a one, who took his text from Ecclesiastes, to the effect that among a thousand he found one good man and not one good woman! This text he spun out for an hour by a description of Adam's original perfection, and wound up by Eve's utter depravity, for whose sin we were yet enduring sin, toil, and woe. Coming out of church I questioned many women as to their opinion. Not one thought of resenting the insult. Not one but said, "However contrary to reason or justice, I accept it!"

I believe the greatest mental and moral repairing the world has ever seen is to result from the womanly believers of the Golden Rule, who "prove" Peter and "try" Paul, and courageously proclaim to the world in what they, as teachers, are found to be wanting. The Bibles of every nation contain lofty conceptions of one supreme God; all hav the commandments; all hav even that "latest and best—Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." It is not Bibles that are lacking. It is a mental awakening of women themselvs, by which mothers will first learn and then teach their children that this long-neglected "neighbor" is woman. Until that time, will still continue what Sir Charles Lubbock calls "the remarkable subordination of the wife to the husband which is so characteristic of marriage, and so curiously inconsistent with all of our avowed ideas," and the anomaly of an autocracy of sex calling itself a republic.

IT was a significant prudence of many of the lay Catholics, who were accustomed to insist that their priest should take a concubine for the protection of the families of the parishioners. . . . It can hardly be questioned that the extreme frequency of illicit connections among the clergy, tended during many centuries most activly to lower the moral tone of the laity. . . . An impure chastity was fostered which continually looked upon marriage in its coarsest light. . . . Another injurious consequence, resulting, in a great measure, from asceticism, was a tendency to depreciate extremely the character and the position of woman.—Lecky.

THERE hav been abundance of people, in all ages of Christianity, who tried . . . to convert us into a sort of Christian Mussulmans, with the Bible for a Koran, prohibiting all improvement; and great has been their power, and many hav had to sacrifice their lives in resisting them. But they hav been resisted, and the resistance has made us what we are, and will yet make us what we are to be.—Mill.

WILKINSON says among no ancient people had woman such influence and liberty as among the ancient Egyptians.—Buckle.

A Symposium on Liberalism.

A short time ago we said this to more than thirty Liberal writers: There has been a great deal of talk at various times and by a good many of the leading Liberals about the Positiv or Constructiv side of Liberalism. It is stated that there is an Affirmativ as well as a Negativ philosophy connected with the Freethought movement; and that Liberals should build a religion or philosophy or system of morality, as well as destroy the system founded on superstition and supernaturalism.

We want to obtain, therefore, for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER the opinion of all the best-known writers for Liberalism on this subject. To do this we put the matter thus:

Is there an Affirmativ, Positiv, Constructiv side to Freethought?

If not, the reason why?

If there be, in what, in your opinion, does it consist, and in what should it consist?

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 8th we shall begin the publication of the replies. We hav received answers from

Capt. Robert C. Adams,
President of the Canadian Secular Union.
F. M. Holland,
Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."
J. H. Burnham,
E. C. Walker,
Editor of Fair Play.
Lucy N. Colman,
Parker Pillsbury,
W. F. Jamieson,
R. B. Westbrook,
President of the American Secular Union.
George E. Macdonald,
Editor of Freethought.
H. O. Pentecost,
Editor of the Twentieth Century.
Susan H. Wixon,
Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner."
Samuel P. Putnam,
President of the California Liberal Union and Editor of Freethought.

And hav been promised replies by Thaddeus B. Wakeman; C. B. Reynolds; W. Stewart Ross, Editor of the London Agnostic Journal; G. W. Foote, Editor of the London Freethinker; Charles Watts, Editor of Secular Thought; J. E. Remsburg, John Peck, and others.

We believe this expression of opinion on this subject will be one on the most valuable and interesting contributions ever made to the literature of Freethought, and may mark the beginning of a new era in the development of the mental world.

Every Liberal should read this symposium and circulate it around the neighborhood for the enlightenment of his neighbors.

THIS issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER will go to several hundred Liberals who are not now subscribers. We call their special attention to the offer of "Try-Square" as a premium for them to send in their subscriptions now.

This issue will also be sent to every national Senator and Representativ in Congress, and we earnestly hope each one will read the article by the American missionary on Senator Blair's proposed educational amendment to our national Constitution.

We hav received during the past week fifty-six new subscribers in response to our solicitations. The senders will find their words of encouragement in the "Letters from Friends" either in the current issue or in the paper next week. Making $113.40 received on .this account, and equal to about forty-five new subscribers, at the average of the club rates. A continuance of these efforts by our friends for a few weeks more will, we feel assured, result in sufficient increase to our list to enable us to hav illustrations for the remainder of the year.

In connection with the subject we would again call attention to the generous offer made by the author of "Try-Square," to this effect: Copies of the book to be given as premiums to, or for, new subscribers who pay the regular price of $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, before March 11th. One copy of the book to be given to every volunteer new subscriber, and one to every old subscriber who procures a new one at the regular price of $3. The price of the book by itself is $1. Regarding this book Mrs. E. D. Slenker writes:

"DEAR FRIENDS: I see THE TRUTH SEEKER has been presented with 'Try-Square' as a premium for subscribers. I want to tell you I hav read the book and like it splendidly. It is so interesting one wants to read it all at one time. It is as good as a novel and as full of truth as need be. You will be sure of a bonanza if you get this as a surplus to your subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope every volume will be called for in short order.

"I feel personally grateful to the author for his generous donation on behalf of our precious pictures. If you only knew how good the book really is I know every copy would be called for in short order. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER."

Since the offer was made in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 11th, several hav availed themselvs of the terms, and hav received the book. We hope that the balance of the five hundred copies will be called for before March 11th. The author has printed his book for the good it will do Liberalism, and not for pecuniary profit to himself.

This is the state of affairs at the present time; let not the efforts slacken till the victory is won.

Religion in the Schools.

The Presbyterian Union, of this city, at a public meeting a few days since discussed this question: "To what extent, if any, should religion be taught in the public schools?" There was, of course, the puritanical advocate, in the person of Rev. Josiah Strong, corresponding secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, but what probably surprised a majority of the people of the city when they read the report of the proceedings of the meeting the next morning, was Dr. Howard Crosby's attitude. That eminent Presbyterian placed himself squarely upon the Freethinkers' platform, that morality is not a part of religion, that morality can and should be taught without teaching religion, and that religion should not be taught in the public schools at all.

Dr. Strong denounced the Catholic purpose to divide the school funds, and denied that the public schools are now Protestant. Speaking of the complaints made by Freethinkers (he called us Secularists), he said that the separation of church and state is well enough, but it does not necessarily involve the disregard of religion. He urged that it can be no violation of anybody's right when undenominational religion is taught, and this, he claimed, is all the religion that is taught—the great fundamental doctrin common to all monotheistic religions; that all the religion taught in the school is necessary to make good moral training and instruction; that morality cannot be secured except by the sanction of religion; that the state has the right to take one man's money to educate the child of another only on the theory that the ignorant child is a danger to the state.

Dr. Strong, evidently, is not a competent collector of facts, and, besides, is a strange reasoner. The very sect of which he is a member has a committee whose duty it is to endeavor to thrust Christianity upon the public schools, and to hav it legally taught in all public institutions of learning that (1) there is a personal God, that (2) each soul (the existence of a soul is assumed) is responsible to this God, that (3) this soul is immortal, that (4) there is a future state of reward and punishment, that (5) the Ten Commandments are of divine authority, that (6) the Sermon on the Mount is equally authoritativ, as given by the son of God, equal part of the trinity, and the savior of the world. If this be not the bedrock basis of Protestantism, Mr. Strong will greatly oblige by stating what is. And furthermore, this committee upon investigation found that substantially these doctrins are now taught in a large proportion of the schools of this state. Mr. Strong knows further, if he knows anything about the schools of this city, that the Protestant religion is taught at the "assemblies" before the regular school hours, and that the teachers would transfer those exercises to the regular school hours were it not that the state department has ruled against it. The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER knows whereof he writes, for he has had a controversy with a school-teacher on this very question, and but a few weeks ago refused the solicitation of a teacher to allow his child to attend one of the "assemblies." The separation of church and state logically necessitates the exclusion of all religion from the schools, and is to that extent a disregard of it; and it certainly is a violation of the rights of any objecting parent when teachers insist (as one once did with us) upon the attendance of his child upon religious services.

The Rev. Dr. Greer, D.D., rector of St. Bartholomew's, followed Dr. Strong. Dr. Greer possesses more logical ability than Dr. Strong. He questioned the practicability of a complete observance of the American doctrin of the separation of church and state in any scheme of teaching religion in the schools without dogma. He could not conceive of a church without doctrin. He insisted that religion cannot be introduced into the public school unless it is doctrinal in the sense of being definit and precise, and he would like to know what are the doctrins in which all the churches agree. He was not alarmed at the talk about godless schools. He could not see that it was any objection to a school of painting or bookkeeping that it was godless.

The Rev. D. G. Wylie had less sense than Dr. Greer, though he correctly described the controversy as triangular—between the Secularists, the Catholics, and the religious unsectarians, as those call themselvs who under the guise of unsectarianism are seeking to engraft upon the schools the greater sectarianism of their particular superstition. Mr. Wylie made the absurd assertion that "it is no mixture of church and state to recognize Christian morality in the schools."

Then came the Rev. Howard Crosby, at once the strictest Presbyterian, the ablest man, and the most logical reasoner in that sect in this city. He said: "We hav got into an educational craze in this matter, and the way to get out of it is to limit the work of the state to where it belongs. We should no more expect to teach religion in the public schools than to teach it in a mechanic's institute for the learning of a technical trade. We hav many excellent organizations for benevolent work that are not concerned with the subject of religion. Are these benevolent institutions Atheistic or irreligious? I believe it is not the business of the state to teach religion. It is the business of the church. Before the state can teach religion it must get a little religion itself. Of course if we are to hav religion taught by the state in this democratic country, we shall hav it taught by the local government. What kind of a religion shall we get from the aldermen? The moment we go one step beyond what is the proper limit of a public school that moment we giv each sect a right to claim that its dogma shall be taught. The only safe way is not to teach any. We invite the people of all creeds and nationalities here, and we hav no right to tax them to propagate our religious notions. It is not true that there is no difference between religion and morality. I say there is a practical difference. It is, for instance, a moral teaching to teach that there are three sins against man, namely, violence, falsehood, and uncleanliness. To teach children that these are wrong will not offend anyone. We cannot go further without teaching religion. But we can go that far without offending anyone in his religion. The state has no right to go further than to teach the simplest branches of education. The whole curriculum can be gone through with in three years, and when we limit public education to that, we shall solve this problem, which has been agitating, and is agitating us, and will continue to agitate us. We must learn that in our public schools we must recognize the rights of all."

Dr. Crosby answers the Rev. Mr. Wylie most effectivly, and also Senator Blair and those who advocate his educational amendment to our national Constitution. The state cannot possibly teach what it does not define. The state must judge what is true and what false religion, it must pronounce with authority of law what is to be taught, and then we shall hav an established religion, if not an established church. To sing Christian hymns, to read the Christian Bible, to teach that hell and heaven are real places for the souls of men and women, is sectarianism even between the liberal and orthodox Christian sects, and as regards the Freethinker it is outrageous. Mr. Crosby is to be congratulated upon the clearness of his vision, and the friends of secularization are also to be congratulated upon their new and powerful ally.

The Church and the Government in Italy.

There is, just now, great solicitude on the part of the American Catholics for the government of Italy. They seem to think that the Lord will take revenge upon it for the enactment of the "Pious Works" bill, which removes the administration of the "Opere Pie" from clerical to secular hands. The Opere Pie are immense funds accumulated through centuries, giving a yearly income of $27,000,000, which should be entirely appropriated for benevolent purposes to the needy people at large. An inquiry made by the government has proved that the clergy who hav the upper hand in this administration do not use the whole of the income for the right purpose, but use it to benefit those people who follow them blindly. In other words, they use this money, as they do all funds in their hands, to advance their own interests. The Pious Works bill, which has been carried through the Chamber of Deputies, is alleged by a journal in activ sympathy with the Romanists to hav the twofold aim of depleting the ranks of the clergy and of depriving them of this lever of influence which they hitherto hav wielded in the capacity of almsgivers. The bill will withdraw the funds of the charitable confraternities, which number about nine thousand, from the ecclesiastical hands by which they hav been administered and turn them over to boards chosen by the municipalities. Priests are expressly made ineligible for membership in these boards. As each of these confraternities has up to this time had its chaplain who acted as almoner, some nine thousand of the minor Italian clergy will be stripped of their stipends at a stroke, and whatever gratitude the poor may henceforth feel for assistance rendered from eleemosynary funds will be gained or expected by lay officials and not by the priesthood.

The enactment of this bill, thinks the journal quoted, threatens not only the security and dignity of the pope, but the very existence of the Catholic religion in Italy. This, it seems to us, is admitting at once that the adherence to the church of a large class of Italians depends upon their being bought by the church, and forms in itself a very good argument for removing from the church the power to bribe the poor. Aud if religion shall suffer from the removal of the cause of corruption, so much the worse for religion. Any religion that must depend upon fraud and force for its continuance ought to go down. And the Catholic religion is an admirable instance in point.

The bill, however, is looked at in another way by sympathizers with the Catholics. It is, they say, but a continuation of the policy of starving the church into submission to the civil government. "Under the successiv ministries of the ex-Garibaldians, Cairoli and Crispi, power has fallen into the hands of the advanced Radicals, and the legislature has shown itself as violently anti-clerical as is the Atheistic section of the French Republicans. No candid observer of the recent trend of things in Italy doubts that the law of papal guarantees is regarded by the Radical majority of the present legislature as a dead letter, and that if Leo XIII. should now signify a willingness to accept its provisions, he would be informed by Signor Crispi that his acquiescence came too late. The independence of the Vatican, which is still theoretically acknowledged, has in practice been so narrowed that little remains to do but to deny to foreign embassadors all access to the person of the pontiff. The Radicals, apparently, will not be satisfied until they hav degraded the pope from the headship of Catholic Christendom to the position of an Italian Metropolitan."

The solicitude for the government, to which reference has been made, is evoked by the pretended fear that the kingdom cannot survive the church. If King Humbert, they say, "has any loyal supporters, they ought to see that the interests of the Savoyard dynasty are seriously imperiled through the course pursued by the anti-clerical majority of the chamber. The blows, which are now leveled not only at the dignity and influence of the pope, but at the numbers and resources of the clergy, are obviously meant to shake the hold of the Catholic religion upon the masses of the Italian people. In any event these hostil demonstrations on the part of the legislature cannot but be detrimental to the house of Savoy. If they fail to alienate the bulk of the Italian population from their ancient faith and traditional religious teachers, resentment and indignation will lead faithful Catholics to welcome any external or internal movement against the existing régime. If the anticlericals succeed in weaning the great body of Italians from Catholicism, the result will not be Protestantism, which in contemporary Europe makes no converts, but Atheistic Socialism. What has taken place in France and Germany will be witnessed in the Italian peninsula. The continental workingman, who in our day abjures Catholicism, does not become a follower of Luther or Calvin, but of Karl Marx. The author of 'Das Kapital,' unlike the reformers of the sixteenth century, assents to no compromise with princes, and is not more hostil to the altar than to the throne. It was Bismarck's recognition of the fact that Socialism is the alternativ to Catholicism that caused him to abandon the Kulturkampf. It is strange that Signor Crispi, who professes devoted loyalty to King Humbert, and who studies so carefully the conduct of the German chancellor, should not hav profited by this lesson. He should, one would think, perceive that in Italy, as in Germany, whatever may be the upshot of a duel between the civil power and religion, the cause of monarchy is sure to suffer. But perhaps Signor Crispi renders only lip-service to his sovereign. An avowed Atheist, an ardent admirer of Mazzini, and an ex-Garibaldian, he would scarcely be expected to deeply deplore the prospectiv advent of an Italian republic."

No doubt all this may be true. It is in any event the revealing of what, to Americans, and especially to American Freethinkers, is welcome intelligence. The altar and the throne hav both been ever inimical to the welfare of the people. If in their struggle with each other they are both destroyed there is cause for nothing but congratulations. The Freethinkers of France hav made that country a republic, as the Freethinkers of America founded our own republic, and the latest work of political and religious heresy is the republic of Brazil. And Castelar in Spain, Bradlaugh in England, Crispi in Italy, all working for freedom of mind and body, and all Freethinkers—what does not the world owe to the heretics!

The very fact that the stability of kingdom depends upon the retention of superstition and the power of the church to keep people ignorant and contented in their ignorance, is sufficient reason why the church should be deprived of that power. Between Roman Catholicism and the Socialism of Karl Marx giv us the Socialism. The Socialists, at least, are trying to help the people, to improve the conditions of life, and to cultivate the reasoning faculties. The church is doing just the opposit of these. But we fancy the fear expressed proceeds rather from a desire to oppose the Pious Works bill than from a real belief that the alleged evils pictured would follow the downfall of Catholicism. France is referred to as a bad example, and one which Italy should refuse to follow. But while Radical France is Atheistic, and the government is anti-clerical, France as a country is not Socialistic. The republicans rule, not the followers of Karl Marx. The men in high office are mainly Freethinkers, avowed and open, some of them Atheists; the policy of the government is human not ecclesiastical, yet France is fairly prosperous, and certainly in no danger of a social revolution. And is there any record of any country which has not bettered itself by establishing a republic?

As the church goes down the people come up. This is the lesson of history.

A Triduum as a Prophylactic.

The Catholic archbishop of Oregon proposes that his state, or at least the Roman Catholics of his state, shall be exempt from the grip of la grippe, and to accomplish this has ordered a triduum, or three days' service. This is the way this curer of souls doctors the grip:

"Let us confess that we are sinners, and that the many blasphemies and other crimes deserve severe punishment. Let us beg of the sinless, immaculate mother of our Lord Jesus whose intercession is so powerful to pray her divine son that Oregon may be spared from this scourge. We therefore order that on the Sunday following the reception of this circular, the respectiv pastors shall read this letter during the holy mass, and invite the people to attend the services of a triduum which shall begin on the following Monday. During the triduum we order the divine sacrifice of the mass to be at a convenient hour in the morning. In the evening at a suitable hour, let the rosary be recited, the devout way of the cross be made, and all ending with benediction of the blessed sacrament.

"We order that from the receipt of this circular until further orders, the reverend clergy will add in the holy mass the collect from the Missa Votiva, pro vitanda mortalitate, and recite after the mass with the people, one Our father and Hail Mary."

It will be interesting to learn what effect this method of treatment will hav on the disease, which here in the East yields not to quinine, aconite, or prayer. And if it once gets a good start in Oregon we fear that even if the Hail Marys be doubled the people's bones will ache and that they will sneeze and cough and take to their beds just as though the archbishop had said nothing. What if the archbishop himself should catch it! Two priests in this city hav died from it.

Why Mr. Pentecost Became an Anarchist.

The following extract from a letter just received givs us the first inkling of the reason why our esteemed contemporary shunted off on to the sidetrack of Anarchy:

MICH. NOLL: Jan: 12: 90.

DEAR SIR: I address myself respectivily on your inviting of your advertisement, what I find in the 20 Century, and I hav been writing 20 years along and lately to the 20 Century and liberty and Individualism But seems are aversed to my writing and put postal stamps in the letters to send reply back on the manuscrips also the Standard But no sign of acceptance and wrote even from 10 months backward nigh every week and the only reference made by the Twenty Century was when he said "I hav learned that valuable ideas sometimes come from very obscure persons who cannot spell well or put their sentence together grammatically" and did not print them. And with my writing made him a anarchist and admonished him to take first the beam out of his own eyes and then could he clearly see to take out the mote.

If we had received a letter like that "nigh every week" for ten months there is no telling what impossible visions we might now see. Mr. Pentecost is hereby exonerated from all blame for his Anarchy.

THE Cleveland Leader and Herald relates these stories of the rapacity of the priests of that city: "The priest of a Bohemian church called on a Catholic servant-girl who is employed on East Madison avenue and demanded a contribution for his church. She said she would contribute a dollar, although she did not feel that she could spare it, as she needed clothes for winter. She went to her room and returned with a $5 bill, which she asked the priest to change for her. He put the bill in his pocket and started away. She protested that she must hav the four dollars in change back, as she needed it to buy shoes. The priest was inexorable. He said that she ought to giv $5—that, in short, she must giv it, even if she had to go without shoes. Saying which he walked away with the $5, being nothing less than a common thief so far as the $4 is concerned. Of course the girl will not prosecute the thief, because of the abjectness of the servitude in which she is under to him. He may invent some punishment for her because the incident has got into print. Another East End servant-girl had but two cents with her one Sunday to put in the contribution plate. This fact was noted and she was told that the next week she must contribute $1 to make up for this small amount. Of course she did so, although she was obliged to borrow the money."

LEXINGTON, KY., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Do not discontinue the pictures by any means. They are just what nine-tenths of the Liberals like. And Liberals patronize the paper, not the orthodox element, I am sure. It is not expected that the pictures are to catch the orthodox eye. W. H. TYREE.

GORDON, NEB., Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for $10.50—$5 to apply on my subscription and the balance for the ANNUALS for 1889 and 1890, and other books. I like the pictures, and will do my best to get a new subscriber. I think I can send you one or two before long. C. W. SMITH.

CLYDE, MICH., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed money for THE TRUTH SEEKER and two ANNUALS. If you hav any leaflets for free distribution, send. I will dispose of them. Continue the pictures. When Samson is through, giv us Lot's wife, but never the old fellow and the girls. WM. T. HEDDEN.

ASHLAND, ORE., Dec. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $10.25 for renewals of myself and friend to the good old TRUTH SEEKER and for the ANNUAL. As we could not get any subscribers, the best we could do is to send you our subscriptions for two years in advance. By all means continue the pictures, if you can without too much loss. O. COOLIDGE.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER two years, two ANNUALS, and two copies "Bible Morals," by Remsburg. Continue the cartoons. I think they are all right. Many of them are very good. I will do what I can to increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I hand you $7.50 for my subscription and to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to the new subscriber whose name and address I send you. OSOAR PARKER.

HORTON, Jan. 1, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I tried to get you a new subscriber, but failed on account of hard times, but will do the next best thing by sending you a "V" for THE TRUTH SEEKER and books. As for the pictures, keep Heston employed, Mr. Parton notwithstanding. Mr. Parton probably has done a good deal for Freethought, but that should not license him to be insulting. Yours for truth, J. W. SOOTT.

SEYMOUR, IND., Jan. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $12 for renewal, the ANNUAL, and books according to inclosed list. As for me and my house, we vote for the pictures, with improvements. We would take THE TRUTH SEEKER pictures or no pictures, but not without the editorials. The answer to the Independent is worth a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Long liv it and its Editor. JOSEPH KLING.

AVOOA, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money for subscription and the ANNUAL. I would prefer to hav the pictures in the paper, but as I am not in financial circumstances to warrant contributing anything in shape of "In God we trust," I will not vote to hav them in or out, although I profess to be a member of the house. Keep THE TRUTH SEEKER afloat, cartoons or not. SILAS HALLOOK.

PARKDALE, TORONTO, Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 on account for THE TRUTH SEEKER, except for one ANNUAL for 1890. I hope you will not discontinue the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If the number of new subscribers do not come up to your wish just at the present time, why, there is no doubt but in a little time you will hav no reason to complain on that account. Yours truly, I. D. GREAVES.

HAVANA, ILL., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5.25 for subscription of THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years and twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I am a little late to pay in advance, but I thought it would better enable you to keep on with Mr. Heston's pictures. I think they do a great deal of good. They are just the thing to call Christians' attention, and they will get to read the paper.

Truly yours, G. H. HOLZGRAFE.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Dec. 26, E.M. 289.

MR. EDITOR: I hope I am not too late in casting my vote for continuing the pictures in our paper. But you know how slowly the mills of Liberalism are grinding. Please find inclosed the names of three new subscribers, with the cash so essential to finding and spreading the truth to the millions of mentally enslaved human beings in this so-much-boasted-of free country. Do not forget the ANNUAL.

A. MANSON.

ASTOR, FLA., Dec. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the best paper in the country. Send me the ANNUAL and apply the balance to the pictures or Watson Heston. Long may he liv. I cannot find a new subscriber here. I gave them my papers to read, I gave them pamphlets, and talked to them—all was of no use. I am willing to pay fifty cents more for the paper to keep the pictures. Yours very truly, JOHN KANE.

GLEN FALLS, N. Y., Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I think it would be far better to devote the space occupied by the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER to a discussion of ways and means of providing the people with cheaper Gods. We do not need to resort to the methods of our greatest enemy, the Roman Catholic church, to support our cause. The hanging up of some dead Jew, in Heston's style, contains no argument of the justice of our cause. Giv us more argument and less trash. ISAAC LEWIS.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken the paper for the year, and must say that it is the finest paper I ever read. I hope the pictures will continue. Long life to Watson Heston. It is certain that the pictures do more good than they do hurt, as I can induce people to look at them who otherwise would not look at the paper at all. I expected to hav two new subscribers by this time, but at the last moment they refused because their wives made such a fuss. Inclosed find $3.25 for the paper and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. J. G. BUTTON.

BEAVER DAM, WIS., Jan. 6, E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $10.50 to be applied to three renewals and two ANNUALS, and $1 of it to work heretofore performed on illustrations of THE TRUTH SEEKER by Watson Heston. As I cannot get a new subscriber, I do the next best thing. I am in favor of the cartoons not only on the first page but on the last page as well. If the pictures should be continued, you can count on me for another dollar or a new subscriber at my next renewal.

Very truly yours, ANDREW WILLARD.

HOWARD, KAN., Jan. 7, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find renewal, and two new names for a continuance of pictures. I do not want to see the pictures go, as I can keep the paper in the shop where I am at work and by showing the pictures can get some interested. This is a hot-bed of orthodoxy, but by a continuance of the same medicin in the future as in the past I think some good may come out of it. Hoping you will get enough new subscribers to keep the pictures in, I remain, Yours in Universal Mental Liberty, F. STALLSMITH.

BARTLEY, NEB., Dec. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As the cash down commands a vote on the pictures, here is ours, $3.75—$3 for subscription another year, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1890, and fifty cents for the pictures. Mr. R. A. Smiley's views are mine—that the cartoons are more valuable than more space devoted to longer articles sometimes. I became first acquainted with James Parton when a child, reading his interesting and instructiv biographical sketches in the Youth's Companion, and though his opinions are highly respected, we beg leave to differ with him in regard to the pictures.

Respectfully yours, MRS. R. E. GEORGE.

SCRANTON, PA., Jan. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5. In return send all the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS from 1884 to 1888, and two for 1890. I hav feared that I should hav to giv up reading entirely. I hav only glanced at THE TRUTH SEEKER for the past three years, but I hav let others read it and kept it on file. I hav been with THE TRUTH SEEKER from its commencement, and with the Boston Investigator thirty-eight years, and my interest in the cause has never abated in the least. And if my financial ballast was heavy enough I would furnish something that would "make Rome howl," as the saying goes.

J. F. GREEN.

ELK GROVE, CAL., Dec. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Your urgent request to delinquent subscribers reminds me that more than a year ago I ordered THE TRUTH SEEKER sent to the herein-named friend. Be kind enough to tell me whether she has renewed. If not, I will. I am making a great effort to send you some new names soon. This month I hav mailed twenty-four packages of TRUTH SEEKERS to as many persons; hav written six letters in your interest, and hav received the promis of one name. If I do not send a half dozen names within the next two months, I shall be greatly disappointed. I say, stick to the pictures if you can possibly afford it. Send ANNUALS to the addresses inclosed. J. H. ATKINS.

WESTMINSTER, CAL., Dec. 26, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I feel a little disappointed in not getting a new subscriber. Most likely I can send you a little money for a few books in place of a subscriber, though I do not intend to giv up inquiry among those where there is the least prospect. As I become more acquainted, chances will improve. December 16th I sent for the ANNUAL—what one I may not hav said through carelessness, but you might guess it was the last one, as I expect to hav all the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS in the future as long as I liv. Those of the past are in my house with my books. Continue THE TRUTH SEEKER pictures by Heston by all means.

LUKE WM. GALLUP.

MANCHESTER, MO., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5.45—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $2.45 for the books named. I hav never taken THE TRUTH SEEKER by mail yet, but hav bought it from a newsdealer from time to time. It will be cheaper for me and better for you to get it regularly by mail. I am greatly pleased with Heston's cartoons, and would be sorry to see them discontinued. With the great mass of mankind, they are more effectiv than a labored argument. Ridicule is a powerful weapon, and is more dangerous to false pretenses than argument, and in your battle with superstition you can not afford to lay aside any of your weapons.

C. W. CAINES.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money for renewal, books, and the ANNUAL, and $1 for the Literature Fund. I see that Mr. John Peck and I had the same experiences about horse-kicks. Mr. Peck's writing just fits my brain.

Mr. J. Bird wants some proofs of the rotundity of the earth. Does he not see the sun rise and set? The shadow of the earth on the moon is round, when there is an eclipse. If we travel east or west we shall come back to the same place. In the frigid zones, one part of the summer the sun does not set at all, but seems to go around above the horizon. Is that not proof? If not, what is.

Mr. J. H. Wood wants no taxation of any kind. He wants the government to issue greenback money. But greenbacks are not money. They are notes that must be paid by taxation, like everything. Taxation is necessary to pay government expenses. Greenbacks are notes that hav to be paid as well as other notes. CHARLES LAMBERT.

CENTRAL CITY, Jan. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Great men will make great blunders, is the old saying, and it repeats itself so often. Is it possible that James Parton is going back on us? I think he will be sorry for his utterances against the pictures, like Grover Cleveland with his free trade doctrin. I hav a family of six children, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is the best of all periodicals, reaches me every Sunday, and is indeed a welcome visitor. One of my children made the remark the other day that Mr. Heston "forgot the monkey," so you see even "the children cry for it." And therefore the vote cast in my family is by acclamation for Watson Heston and plenty of pictures.

Yours for pictures by all means, A. S. BLEYER.

COLUMBUS, O., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Apropos the pictures. Illustrate alternate numbers, or as many as you can afford. Those in favor could not expect more, while Mother Grundy could use the blanks for missionary work without making rubicund the old lady's cheek of modesty. But the cartoons are mild compared with the idiocy which they are intended to caricature, and it is only false modesty that objects to them. Let the phantom of immodesty and imbecility "cover its eyeless sockets with its fleshless hands and fade forever from the imaginations of men." Wishing that you may grow fat in laughing at the different whims of your subscribers, I am for THE TRUTH SEEKER, pictures or no pictures. J. J. BURDGE.

GILMAN, ILL., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.25 for renewal, books, and the ANNUAL. I am doubtful as to the illustrations. Often, when requesting a pious neighbor to read some article that strikes me as being particularly good, one look at the pictures and he will hand it back to me with the remark, "That is all I want of that." Still, I like them, and am well content to let you manage that business. We hav six churches and five saloons in this place, population twelve hundred, and as I take no stock in either I am lonesome, as there are no other places of amusement. I hav just finished reading Herndon's "Life of Lincoln," and think it the best history I ever read. It tells the truth. H. C. MOSHER.

CARTHAGE, MO., Jan. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I for one protest against Mr. Parton's idea of disposing of the pictures. I say, keep them in. They are the life of your paper, and are doing good work. I think anyone who fails to see the good they are doing for the cause of Infidelity had better go back to the church and pray a little while longer, for to him the ninth day has not yet come. He should be allowed longer time to get his eyes open. As to the art displayed in the pictures, no one expects steel engravings. And as to the vulgarity in them, anyone kicking from that view-point had better read the old part of the Bible and compare notes. Mr. Heston need not expect to please all. Christ, even, did not, and all Christians say he was perfect; which is much more than we claim for Brother Heston. Inclosed find remittance for the ANNUAL for 1890.

Yours fraternally, MRS. GEO. W. KOONTZ.

BIG SPRINGS, TEX., Jan. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The pictures suit me first-rate. True, a Christian cannot be induced to read the paper when he sees a picture of that kind. Like an American by Limburger cheese—the smell keeps him from eating, but it tastes better than it smells. THE TRUTH SEEKER will not make many converts, but it is "awful good readin'" for old soldiers in the heretical camp, and mainly they are the ones to please. The man who subscribes and pays for his paper needs to be served first, the Christian afterward. Please your patrons. The school-house and history will make all the Infidels the country needs, if patronized. THE TRUTH SEEKER is for my private enjoyment "on the side." It is not too radical. It cannot well convert anyone, but does its good in confirming and comforting him who is already firm in the faith. May you succeed. A VETERAN.

MADISONVILLE, KY., Dec. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: By all means keep Heston's cartoons before the people. I hav been eager to see his picture of the Lord when he got into such a rage, and Moses cooled him down so quick by reminding him that the Egyptians would hear it, and they would tell the Canaanites, and they would poke fun at him (Num. xiv, 13-20)! He acknowledges that he would hav played the devil and smashed things, but he "feared the wrath of the enemy" lest they would say, "The Lord hath not done all this" (Deut. xxxii, 26, 27)! I hav been thinking for some time of writing some articles for THE TRUTH SEEKER, setting forth some of the lies, exaggerations, contradictions, incredible and inconsistent yarns, false prophecies, etc., of the holy Bible, but hav never got at it as yet. I think I will send one along soon. I inclose twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

Yours respectfully, COLEBY A. SMITH.

WILKESBARRE, PA., Jan. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $4. Send me the paper for one year and the ANNUAL. The seventy-five cents you may apply to the production of the pictures. I hav for years sent my subscription one year at a time instead of $5 for two years. I thought the half dollar would aid in the illustrations, which are very cutting and shocking to those who fear the truths they lay open. It is true that many of the Bible pictures are more laughable than instructiv, but you will please to remember what trashy subjects Heston has to work on. My opinion is, giv us the pictures by all means, for those who will not read Ingersoll or anybody else will get a shock of mirth or ridicule when they look on Heston's work. One friend will call occasionally and inquire "about those ungodly pictures," and he even relishes them, although they are driving daggers at the superstition and nonsense he was taught from childhood, and after a while he may want to subscribe for it so as to see them all. J. R. PERRY.

FORESTPORT, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5, for which you will send one of your binders, also a copy of the ANNUAL, and apply the balance on subscription. I would send a new subscriber if I could—not for the sake of continuing the pictures, for I think they do more harm than good, especially those on the last page. Those wretched cartoons are the first part that meet the eye, and to most people they convey an impression that the whole thing is rude, vulgar, and obscene, both inside and outside. The same opinion is very apt to be extended to the person offering the paper, and all are condemned and rejected together without trial or examination. I know I hav found it so with parties who were very far from being zealous defenders of church or creed, and who I verily believe would hav read the paper and found something in it to approve and admire had they not been repelled and disgusted at the very outset. I hope you will get those five hundred extra subscribers, and many more with them, but I say again it would be easier to get them if the pictures were abolished. JEREMIAH O'BRIEN.

MADISON, GA., Jan. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5; apply $3 to renewal, $1 to the cartoon fund, and the balance to sending ANNUALS. I think Heston's delineations are fine—too good to be lost. Every picture is an instructiv chapter in the history of the past, and some are that in the history of the present and future. If a man does not love picture-writing, it is a misfortune to him. For much of our fine poetry and prose are picture-writing, and could be portrayed more plainly in cartoons. To keep the delineations of Mr. Heston alive in THE TRUTH SEEKER is the easiest thing in the world. The way is this: in addition to your subscription let every lover of the pictures do as I hav done—plank down $1 for the fund, and if this is not sufficient, add annually $2 to the fund. And I for one will annually contribute $5 for the same purpose rather than lose a picture from one number. I know Christians do not like them, because they make the truth too plain. Take the drawings out of the Scientific American or Harpers' Weekly and their value would be very much lessened. Now, subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, think on this thing and act promptly. A. A. BELL, M.D.

PORT HURON, MICH., Jan. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find the money for two subscribers. I am a Spiritualist, and know that we liv after the change styled death. All things are composed of spirit and matter, and the pictures are the spirit of your journal, and when they cease, your sheet will be a stranger to my household. I must deny Mrs. Foster's assertions that the pictures "are vile and shocking." Whenever truth becomes offensiv to any person that individual should join the church, as this fraud has blighted the progress of earth's children for ages under the plea that "we dare not let our offspring see or know the truth." The same howl was made about Thomas Paine's book, "The Age of Reason." There has been no picture or cartoon in your paper that has been offensiv to decency or taste, unless the Christians admit that their inspired word of God is a fraud on the people. The notice you publish from a church organ shows that the spirit is at work, and will bring the foolish out of the mud of ignorance. I earnestly ask that each reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will get one or two subscribers and forward the cash for the same, and all who are in arrears pay up at once, and thus by all means keep up the cartoons on "holy writ," as they are doing more to destroy the church than one hundred volumes of books could do. W. E. LEONARD.

EUGENE, ORE., Dec. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Hoping to get new subscribers I hav delayed my renewal too long. Herewith I remit $3.50 for renewal, and for the ANNUAL and Ingersoll's "Defense of Reynolds." I also send money and name of a new subscriber. THE TRUTH SEEKER is good enough for me with or without the pictures. But I think that the cartoons make a valuable supplement. I can never get done laughing at many of them. They furnish an impressiv panorama of those monstrous phases of imposture and revolting absurdity which the church has so long protected under the mask of "sacred" faith and fiction. Suppose some of the pulpit-jugglers may be shocked into their holy colic of indignation, and that some of the yawning superstitious dreamers should be startled by the Heston logic, can they elude the challenge and the awakening of their normal intuition of reason and fact? As one gun, or class of guns, may not reach all the theological owls, I am more than willing for Heston to blaze away. It appears to me that the field is wide, various, and needy enough to giv room and work for all.

The theocracy are still making adroit use of all arts in order to gull and enslave the people. They still hav a painful hankering after the good old fashions. These self-inspired oracles of divine wind want to yet extend and maintain their absolute power over heaven, earth, and hell. They want to renew the terrors of the Dark Ages so that the church can again confiscate all the wealth and learning of the world, and waste all on the shrines of fabulous gods, saints, and saviors, and the holy clergy control it all, under the supreme authority of the gracious old Bible Inquisition. Oh, yes, in that sad day of priestly triumph the modern Brunos would hav to bleed and writhe and roast. But our multitudes of good and honest people, who hav for ages received the hereditary taint of religious insanity, must be restored to their normal reason. For this we work and hope, for friend or foe, that we and they may enjoy the blessings of a truly republican government. J. C. SNODGRASS.

TEXAS, MICH., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed cash for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890. We hav sent you new subscribers in the past, and will do so in future as opportunity presents. My vote on the illustrations is, let them come. They are good object-lessons. They are ideas clothed or materialized. As to the bad effect on Christians, I hav this to say. I am a Spiritualist, and we invite all critics who hav investigated modern Spiritualism to point out its weak points. We are ready to drop it when it is found unsound. Now, I contend that when there is put forth any creed or statement for general acceptance by the people that is an insult to known fact, such as are a thousand and one Bible stories said to be the word of God, the people hav a perfect right to investigate or criticise in any way best suited to attract a reasoning mind. Now, when the Bible says God will not show his face but will condescend to show his back, it awakens all the mirthfulness in the nature of anyone who is not filled with superstition. Do Christians go around on tip-toe for fear of hurting the feelings of all classes who do not indorse their religion? Not much. Do Bible-believers in their public ministrations giv liberty to investigators to ask questions? Emphatically, no. They well know their dogmas cannot stand the test of common sense. There is no better way to reform a drunkard than to show him his picture in all its hideousness. All people of the present day can know about the Bible is to take it just as it reads (and that is bad enough), and, considering its claim of divinity, make it a subject of ridicule. So let it come. I hav no great admiration for weak-kneed Liberals. The fact is, they are not more than half converted from orthodoxy. I am utterly opposed to false pretenses. This wheedling Christians into our ranks by mixing superstition of the past with practical common sense of the present day, is unfair. I detest a lie, even if it is adorned with gray hairs. Come off the fence, let us be on one side or the other. L. S. BURDICK.

EUREKA SPRINGS, ARK., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In sending a renewal of my subscription, I had not seen your article calling for expression of opinion on Mr. Heston's cartoons. If I had, I should hav inclosed a "V" instead of a three, for two years. As it is, I now send you $2, which, with the $3 sent, makes the $5 for two years. I had rather hav got you another subscriber. I find a few that would subscribe, but cannot afford it, and others that cannot hav manliness to face the current of religious superstition. I make it a rule to read the paper I take and hand it over to such as will read.

We hav here a simon-pure dudish Baptist minister. I hav been told by many that in one of his late sermons he declared that the moral man was the worst one we hav among us. I notice in our courts we hav criminals that are Christians arraigned and convicted for almost every felonious act. If the minister is not a liar, would it not be better for Christians to influence our legislators o enact a law making it a felony to do good, love mercy, act ustly, etc., at the same time repealing all laws that would punish a Christian for a present violation of law? Let the laws be so they can be enforced only against the disbeliever or one not a member of any Christian denomination. For all powers that be are of God, and God will surely protect his own followers. Let the disbeliever and him that does not show his belief by the roll of the church be amenable only to the laws made by man.

I myself am pleased with the pictures. I think Mr. Heston aims to giv a correct expression from the Bible as he understands it. To do him justice, we are bound by all rules of fairness to suppose so. What if a few should differ with him in the conception of some? Are Christians agreed on their own book? Has not this very discord been the cause of so many Christian denominations? Does anyone suppose that the pictures given by Christians of Christ are anything like the Jew they worship as a God? They may not be thankful, and hate Mr. Heston for furnishing them. Is that any worse than hating the Jews that furnished them a God? Some write they are coarse. Let such but revert back to the history of the times of these enactments and see if they really do not flatter. Could the pictures of some be made more horrifying than the performance? The one representing the burning of Bruno may offend some Catholics, but if it does it is pleasing to the Protestants. A picture portraying the burning of Michael Servetus under the government of John Calvin may offend Presbyterians and all followers of John Calvin. If it does, it is to the gratification of other Protestants and to the great delight of the Catholics. If the pictures giv offense to most Christians, it is not because they do not represent the truth, but because they do. The taking of offense is but an acknowledgment of conscious guilt. How could a cartoon eliciting in a Christian a sense of shame for the cause he adheres to be otherwise than productiv of good? I hav heard Christians sing:

Ashamed of Jesus? Just as soon
Ashamed of midnight and of noon.

If these people are in truth not ashamed of their religion, why should they be offended at a truthful representation of it? How could they be conscientious in their faith and be offended at a correct representation of a picture? Is a disbeliever in Christianity offended by being called an Infidel, and would a picture representing his non-acceptance of the miraculous, etc., be offensiv to him? Should a drunkard that really believes that drunkenness is right, be offended at a cartoon representing a drunkard as he is when drunk? And would you withhold such cartoons simply because they would giv offense to that class that so debase themselvs? These pictures cause many to refer to the book, read on the subject cartooned, and to ponder and think. Might not this lead to investigation? And if it did, we know with what result. JOEL HAYES.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Light and Airy.

A BOY'S FIRST TROUSERS.

A man may arise to the loftiest station
And hearken to words that are spoken in praise,
Be chosen to fill a high place in the nation,
And favored and honored in numerous ways;
But none of the gifts which in manhood hav sought him
So filled up his being with wonderful joy,
Or bright dreams of things yet to be ever brought him,
As the first pair of trousers he wore when a boy.

When a boy's kilted skirts are no longer deemed proper,
The babies who wear them must then stand aside;
He's grown all at once to a wonderful whopper,
And small fry must by his decisions abide.
He feels he is one of the lords of creation,
And straightway proceeds all his rights to enjoy.
There's nothing can bring such a great transformation
As the first pair of trousers we wore when a boy.

Notice.

Some three months ago two prizes of $5 each were offered in the Corner, one for the best essay on Morality, and the other for the best short story relating to some scientific subject. So few responses hav been received, we hav decided to extend the time to March 15th.

The design of these prizes is to stimulate thought. Look over back numbers of the Corner to October 1st and note the conditions of the offer. Do not think you are not able to compete, but try; do your best.

"How a Toad Undressed Itself."

A roar of laughter from the backyard roused Mrs. Lee from her afternoon nap with a start that set her head to aching very violently. She had lain down to try and sleep off a disagreeable headache and was peacefully resting on the sofa in her cool and darkened parlor, lost to everything around her in a quiet sleep, when her children startled her with their merry laughter.

"Oh, dear," she thought, as she pressed her hands to her throbbing temples, "I shall go wild if this headache doesn't leave me soon." And she closed her eyes to try and sleep again, when the children's merriment took extra force and the laughter changed to a scream which sounded as if it might be made to scare away a troop of Indian braves, in war paint and scalping-knife, that was swooping down on them from some secret ambush.

"Rest is impossible," she sighed, "with such a noisy group of children at play so near the house." And she rose languidly and threw open the blinds of the window that opened toward the garden. The children all stood in a circle watching something on the ground, and the screams of laughter told too well that they had found something unusual, and Mrs. Lee stepped out on the porch, half forgetting her headache in the wonder and excitement of the moment.

"O mamma!" cried little Ollie, as she saw her mother watching them from the porch where she was standing. "Come here and see what we hav found!"

"Do come, mamma," cried all the children in chorus, as they clapped their hands and shouted again at the top of their voices.

"Hush, children," said Mrs. Lee, as she came slowly down the walk. "You are making too much noise. You will excite the curiosity of the whole neighborhood if you are not more quiet."

"You will laugh, too," cried Willie, in his boisterous way, "when you see what this toad is doing." And they made room for her in the circle.

Mrs. Lee came upon the scene just in time to see the toad giv its last swallow and then hop away.

"That is really amusing, children, and out of the ordinary run of a toad's conduct, but I guess I shall not laugh very heartily," said Mrs. Lee, though she could not help but smile at the crestfallen appearance of the children who stood around in blank amazement.

"Could a toad cause all this noise by merely swallowing as if it had been eating, then hop away to find something else it might devour?" said their mother.

"Oh, mamma, the toad undressed itself," said Willie, "and it was the funniest sight I ever saw."

Just then another large toad attracted their attention, a few feet away, which acted so oddly that they watched it to see what it would do.

He appeared sluggish and began to press his elbows against his sides, and rub downward. After a few smart rubs his skin began to burst open straight along his back; but he kept on rubbing until he had worked all his skin into folds on his sides and hips, then grasping one hind leg with both his hands he hauled off one leg of his pants the same as anybody would, then stripped the other hind leg in the same manner. He then took his cast-off article forward between his forelegs into his mouth and swallowed it; then, by raising and lowering his head, swallowing as his head came down, he stripped off the skin underneath until he came to his forelegs, then grasping one of these with his opposit hand, by considerable pulling stripped off the skin, and by a slight motion of the head and all the while swallowing he drew it from the neck and swallowed the whole.

As the toad hopped away after undressing itself, Mrs. Lee laughed heartily with the children, who almost shrieked with merriment.

ADELAIDE RANDALL.

Civil War Generals—Where They Were Born.

It is a fact worthy of note that the leading Federal generals of the late war were nativs of Ohio, and some of the leading Confederates were nativs of Virginia. Among the famous Union leaders who were born in Ohio may be proudly mentioned Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, McPherson, McDowell, McCook, Rosecrans, Buell, Garfield, Hepburn, Gillmore, Custer, Weitzel, and Schenck. Among the Union generals that New York produced, are Halleck, Kearney, Schofield, Sickles, Doubleday, Ellsworth, Warren, King, Slocum, Wool, and Wadsworth. Pennsylvania gave us McClellan, Hancock, McCall, Franklin, and Geary. Massachusetts came to our aid with Hooker, Stevens, Stone, Whipple, and Lander. New Hampshire produced Ben Butler and Fitz John Porter. From Kentucky came Oglesby, McClernand, Mitchel, Pope, Anderson, and Buford. Virginia furnished us with Thomas and Newton. Connecticut threw in Terry, Sedgwick, Lyon, and Birge. Maine added Howard and Berry. Indiana comes to the front with Burnside, Milroy, Miller, and Lew Wallace. Logan was born in Illinois, Hawley in North Carolina, Kilpatrick in New Jersey, Hazen in Vermont, Hunter in District of Columbia, and Sykes in Delaware.

Among the Confederate generals who were born in Virginia are Lee, Hill, Stonewall Jackson, Magruder, Joe Johnston, Edward Johnson, J. E. B. Stuart, Early, Price, Floyd, Rodes, Mahone, and Ashby. Kentucky gave the Confederacy Buckner, Albert Sydney Johnston, and Hood. Georgia produced Hardee and Gordon. The Carolinas added Longstreet, Bragg, and Polk. Ewell was born in the District of Columbia, Pemberton in Pennsylvania, Van Dorn in Mississippi, Bushrod R. Johnson in Ohio, and Beauregard in Louisiana.

Among the Federal naval heroes are Worden and Wilkes, who were born in New York, Porter in Pennsylvania, Farragut in Tennessee, Foote in Connecticut, and Dupont in New Jersey.

Some of the Union generals were born in foreign countries. Meagher and Shields were born in Ireland, Meade in Spain, and Sigel in Bavaria. For the above statistics I am indebted to Chambers' Encyclopedia, which contains short sketches of the lives of most of the generals.

Education.

A Detroit father has undertaken a little educational venture with his own children, and he is trying to make them giv up slang, the use of ambiguous terms of speech, and other peculiarities affected by the youth of the day. Yesterday he asked his fourteen-year-old daughter where a certain book was.

"I havn't an idea, papa!" answered the young lady.

"I didn't ask you for ideas," said the father sternly: "just answer my question. Where is that book?"

"On the top shelf in the book case," recited the girl like a parrot.

"Can you reach it?"

"Yes, sir."

There was a long silence, the father waiting impatiently for the book. At last he asked:

"Nell, why don't you bring it?"

"Bring what, sir?"

"The book I wanted."

"You did not say you wanted me to get it," said the girl in a demure voice; "you asked me if I could reach it."

"Nellie," said the father, as a smile made his mustache tremble, "get that book like a good girl and bring it here to me."

"Now you're talking sense, pop; I'll hav the book in a jiffy," and she whisked off after it, while the father sighed over the degeneracy of the times.

A Very Humane Little Boy.

Little S——, four years old, was taken to church one day, and in the course of the service, it gradually dawned upon him that the attention of the congregation was centered, not upon himself, but upon the clergyman, who was unobservant of S——. He felt the neglect keenly. He exhibited signs of restlessness, sighed most wearily, and finally attracted the attention of a lady sitting directly behind him, who leaned over and whispered:

"What is the matter, S——?"

"Oh!" he replied, "I can think of so many things to do so much better than this."

It Bothered Her.

The Rev. Dr. Chamberlain, of Brooklyn, told a laughable story in the course of his address before the Evangelical Alliance. He said that a little Brooklyn girl returned home from Sunday-school "in a state of mind" because she had heard there that Jesus was a Jew. She appealed to her mother for a confirmation of the report.

"Yes, my dear, Jesus was a Jew," said her mother.

"Well, mamma, he was the son of God, was he not?"

"Yes, my dear."

"Well," said the little one, "I don't see how it ever happened that Jesus was a Jew, when God himself is a Presbyterian."

Correspondence.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Jan. 4, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send a short poem for the Corner, and, as I expect I bother you with so many contributions, I will not write more soon. I was glad to hear that you were elected a member of the Fall River school board, and I congratulate you upon your success.

Your true friend, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

ROOKVILLE, IDA., Jan. 4, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for six years. I like to read the Children's Corner. We hav about six inches of snow in the valley, but on the mountains around us it is very deep. I and my brother and sister are going to school. We hav two miles to go. Father or Brother Frank takes us in the sled. When the weather is good we hav to walk. Our school will be out in two weeks. Your friend,

W. A. CARLTON.

WHEELING, W. VA, Jan. 2, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write for the Corner. You would better stir up the Liberal girls and boys. I like to see the Corner interesting. My sister writes for the Corner. My pa writes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also the Investigator and the Better Way. I like to write for the Corner. I should like to correspond with some of the boys. We hav a hard time getting a hall for our Secular Union. I hope we shall get settled some time.

We hav twenty-nine members. I hope we shall get a hall full. I like liberty. Every man that likes liberty ought to belong to a Secular Union. The church people are trying to make everybody observe Sunday as they may say. I don't like it. If I wish to go out in the backyard to play marbles on Sunday it is nobody's business. I had two little rabbits, and they died. I shall get some more some time. I like rabbits, they are such mild, peaceable animals. I think I will close. Good bye, ORLO I. NOE.

OSCEOLA, IA., Jan. 7, 1890.

MISS SUSAN WIXON, Dear Friend: Considerable time has elapsed since I hav addressed a letter to the Corner. I will now try to write a few words to the Children's Corner. I hav been reading your "Visit to Philadelphia." I think it is very nice. I should like to go and make a visit there myself. There must be many grand buildings there. I am going to ask papa if he will send for the "Story Hour" or the "Apples of Gold" for me. Our school was out two weeks ago. The teacher gave us large prize cards and treated to candy on the last day of school. For Christmas I got a gold ring, my brother Pearl got a suit of clothes and a box of checkers, my brother Willie got a toy horse and boy. We all got nuts and candy. I hav a little baby sister. She is three and a half months old. I read the Children's Corner every week. We take the Osceola Homestead, Democrat, Des Moines Advocate, Chicago Times, Youth's Companion, and THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read the stories in all these papers every week. Yours truly, JENNIE GIGRAY.

MOUND CITY, Jan. 3, 1890.

MISS SUSAN WIXON, Dear Friend: You may be surprised to hear from me. I hav not written for so long. I wrote about my kitten the last time. Well, I want to tell the little folks of the Corner the fate of my poor pussy. There are but two Infidels in the small town in which I liv. My father is one of them. The rest are all Methodists. My kitty went out to catch a mouse one day. Well, it got some poison and died. The Christians are very "good" around here. They poisoned my cat because it was mine, and I, they said, was an Infidel. Now, I will tell you about my dog I spoke about in the last letter I wrote. Well, they got away with him, but not in the same way. There was a nice little Christian boy took a notion into his head that he would like a dog pretty well, so he coaxed him off one day. So I hav not got any pets now, and cannot keep them either. I felt very bad when my kitten died.

I hav not any more to say, but to bid you good-bye. JENNIE SHUCK.

VERSAILLES, IND., Dec., 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav been teaching school at Napoleon, Ind., and am spending several days with my parents at sister's, I thought I would prepare an essay on the subject of "Morality" for the Corner, as I am under the required age. I hope it will prove acceptable, and I also hope that my many friends of the Corner will likewise send in their compositions so that we may hav quite a variety to interest all, and I should be pleased to read the opinions of others on the same subject. It is an extremely difficult subject, and affords abundant means for thought. It includes numerous points which demand minute attention—in fact, the more thought and study we giv the subject the more there is to be learned, and too much thought cannot be given it. My sister sends two poems for the Corner, if suitable.

Well, as I do not wish to take up too much valuable space, I will close, wishing all a happy and prosperous new year.

Your friend, LEONORA STOOKINGER.

WHEELING, W. VA., Jan. 2, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I do not see as many letters in the Corner as there ought to be. I don't see why the girls and boys don't write, sometimes there being only one contributor. The last time I wrote for the Corner I invited some of the Liberal girls and boys to write to me. The result of my invitation is that I hav two little lady correspondents, and I am proud of them. If there are others that wish to write to me I will gladly answer. I like to write letters and it is by practice that we become good composers. I hav a few house plants. I like flowers. I hav to do the housework and attend to my flowers, write for the Corner, answer my correspondence, and write essays to read in the Secular Union. I also hav to study books. All this keeps me so busy that I don't get time enough to play as a little girl like me ought. I suppose I am about the smallest housekeeper in town, for I don't weigh eighty pounds. But the best goods are usually done up in small packages, it is said. Good-bye. EMMA ADELLE NOE.

LOOKING BACKWARD

By Edward Bellamy,

Author of "Dr. Heidenhoff's Process," etc.

It is a thought-breeding book, and all who are free to receive new light will find in it satisfaction and inspiration.—[New York Tribune.

The appeal is always made to a man's reason, and to his noblest sentiments: never to his selfishness.—[Boston Post.

A suggestion of a really practicable and feasible social state greatly in advance of the present. The romantic narratiy is rich in its forecast of actual possibilities.—[Boston Traveler.

News of the Week.

In Westphalia, Germany, the miners' strike for eight hours and increased pay is spreading.

Several officers of the czar's guard hav committed suicide to escape arrest for Nihilist plotting.

The governor of New Hampshire seems about to make a determined attempt to enforce the Prohibition law of that state.

The Second Colored church of Hackensack, N. J., was the scene of a free fight on the 17th, and the law has taken the matter in hand.

The other day Exhorter Weyler of the Lutheran church at York, Pa., fell dead in the pulpit at finishing a prayer, no doubt by visitation of God.

A man named John Derkins is the latest victim of religious mania in New York. His case grew so bad that he was sent to the asylum, and has died.

On account of the establishment of Mormon settlements in the Canadian Northwest, the Canadian legislature will pass a more pointed law against polygamy.

The winter on the Atlantic coast has been unexampled in mildness. It was conjectured that the course of the Gulf Stream had changed, but this supposition is disproved.

Walker Blaine, son of Secretary Blaine, died on the 15th of pneumonia following the grip. He was aged thirty-five. As he was able and trusted, his loss is a severe blow to his father.

The grand jury of Onondaga county, N. Y., recommend suppression and punishment of Christian Science and faith cure healers. These people hav been the cause of several deaths there.

The Pittsburgh Builders' Exchange, composed of master builders and lumbermen, has declared against the eight-hour movement, and purposes to join the National Builders' Association and obtain its coöperation in the contest.

The Senate committee on territories will defer considering the admission of Idaho till the Supreme Court has decided the appeal taken to it by Mormons against the anti-polygamy provision adopted by the Idaho constitutional convention.

Good is looked for from the proposals of the International American Congress to submit all differences between American powers to arbitration. And it is urged that, should arbitration fail and war ensue, there shall be no annexation of conquered territory. Thus the Monroe doctrin, that no conquest of territory neighboring to us be allowed from without, is supplemented by this condemnation of conquest from within.

England continues to insist that Portugal vacate the disputed African territories, and has sent war-ships to enforce her demand. Portugal bases her claim upon the discovery of the lands two hundred years before England. But England holds that she has forfeited her rights by neglect. In Lisbon the British embassy has been attacked, and mobs are parading the streets shouting, "Down with England!" Catholic organs in this country and everywhere are supporting Portugal's claim.

On the 13th tornadoes swept from Missouri across Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio to New York. Houses were wrecked and lives lost in many places. Deaths resulted, at St. Louis, 3; Olney, Ill., 1; Rochester, N. Y., 1; Syracuse, N. Y., 1. Also, a tornado at Clinton, Ky., demolished 55 houses, killing 10 persons and injuring 53. A blizzard ravaged Kansas and Nebraska, stopping trains with snow, and leaving people in the former state now exposed to starvation. The Lord did not neglect to destroy as many Christian churches as possible.

It is still disputed whether the new government of Brazil is of honest intention. The question has entered our political party strife, as the Republican administration has cautiously deferred recognition of the new rule, and Democrats blame the hesitation. It is said that a military mutiny, in which one hundred insurgents were shot, has taken place at Rio. Liberals in politics everywhere desire to think the best of the provisional government, but cannot help wishing it would giv a more satisfactory explanation of its postponement of the promised popular election.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

BLASPHEMY AND THE BIBLE.

By C. B. Reynolds.

Price, 5 cents.

THIRD EDITION.

BIBLE MYTHS;

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Heathen Illustration of the Temptation.]

The Bundehesh (a sacred book of the Persians,) states that Ahuramazda after creating the first man and woman, Mashya and Mashyana, bade them "to be humble of heart; to observe the law; to be pure in their thoughts, pure in their speech, pure in their actions." But an evil demon came to them in the form of a Serpent, sent by Ahriman, the prince of devils, and gave them fruit of a wonderful tree, which imparted immortality. Evil inclinations then entered their hearts, and all their moral excellence was destroyed. Consequently they fell, and forfeited the eternal happiness for which they were destined. They killed beasts, and clothed themselves in their skins.

Bible Myths shows this to be the origin of the Hebrew story.

THE

MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A COMPENDIUM OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

By WINWOOD READE.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill.—[Literary World.
You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—[Inter-Ocean.
His history has a continuity, a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—[New Haven Palladium.
The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—[Penn Monthly.

Gems of Thought.

In exact proportion as nations advance in civilization, the accounts of miracles taking place among them become rarer and rarer, until at last they entirely cease.—Lecky.

The French Revolution has excommunicated the church from the power of working miracles; she has not been able, with the assistance of all her saints, to work one miracle since the Revolution began; and as she never stood in greater need than now, we may, without the aid of divination, conclude that all her former miracles were tricks and lies.—Paine.

Always treated as a slave, man has contracted the vices of a slave.—D'Holbach.

As long as the majority of men will cringe to the very earth before some petty prince or king, what must be the infinit abjectness of their little souls in the presence of their supposed creator and God?—Ingersoll.

It must never be forgotten that not the most monstrous of Christian superstitions, not the most grotesque of Christian miracles, not the most inhuman of Christian dogmas, fail to find their prototype in the books of the Old Testament and the New. Kings and popes, witch-finders and miracle-mongers, may all plead their cause in words taken from that medley of documents.—Westminster Review.

The frightful text, "He that believes shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned," has covered the earth with blood. It has filled the heart with arrogance, cruelty, and murder. It has caused the religious wars; bound hundreds of thousands to the stake; founded inquisitions; filled dungeons; invented instruments of torture; taught the mother to hate her child; imprisoned the mind; filled the world with ignorance; persecuted the lovers of wisdom; built the monasteries and convents; made happiness a crime, investigation a sin, and self-reliance a blasphemy. It has poisoned the springs of learning; misdirected the energies of the world; filled all countries with want; housed the people in hovels; fed them with famin; and but for the efforts of a few brave Infidels it would hav taken the world back to the midnight of barbarism, and left the heavens without a star.—Ingersoll.

The calamities with which the world is afflicted, are the result of the ignorance of man, and not of the interference of God.—Buckle.

Take theology from the world, and the money wasted on superstition will do away with want.—Ingersoll.

A religion that makes a man cruel, persecuting, and intolerant, is a bad religion for society.—Dr. Thomas Cooper.

For thirty years Europe was one vast battle-field, and the war was produced by the Bible. The revocation of the edict of Nantes was produced by the sacred scriptures. The instruments of torture—the pincers, the thumbscrews, the racks, were produced by the word of God. The Quakers of New England were whipped and burnt by the Bible—their children were stolen by the Bible. The slave-ship had for its sails the leaves of the Bible. Slavery was upheld in the United States by the Bible. The Bible was the auction-block.—Ingersoll.

SAMSON TEARETH DOWN THE WIGWAM.

And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines. And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords, and upon all the people that were therein: so the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life.—Judges xvi, 30.

A HOLY FAMILY—SUPERSTITION AND SOME OF HER CHILDREN.

Notes and Clippings.

It is said in Washington that Representativ Randall's alliance with the Presbyterian church was brought about through the influence of Postmaster-General Wanamaker. Wanamaker and Randall hav long been friends, and the former has been a constant caller at Mr. Randall's house of late. There was a rumor at one time that Mr. Randall would become a Catholic.

The "star of Bethlehem," which ancient people made so much fuss about when the child Jesus was born, will be visible this year —its seventh appearance. It comes once in three hundred and fifteen years, and is of wondrous brilliancy for about three weeks. So the Christ significance, says the Banner of Light, that has absorbed the pious mind so long, at last is dissipated by astronomy, and thus far, superstition is relegated to obscurity.

Signor Crispi, the premier of Italy, has won immortality at a bound. The Italian government, which has a monopoly of the cigar-making industry of Italy, has ordered that a new brand of cigars be called "The Crispi." So says the World. Another heretic has been similarly immortalized, and that is Colonel Ingersoll. The story goes that the manufacturer sent him a box of the cigars called "Our Bob," that he passed them over to his wife's brother-in-law, who in turn gave them to the butler. What the butler did with them is not known.

New Jersey has a school fund of $4,000,000, and doesn't know what to do with it. It can't be used for anything but the public schools, and not very much of it is allowed to go there, only a part of the annual income being available, so jealously has the state constitution guarded its sacredness. Meantime it is piling up every year, and the commissioners are at their wits' end to find an investment for it. If the jury convened in the Reynolds case is a fair sample of New Jersey enlightenment, it would not be a bad idea to spend the fund on education.

A miner in Rhonoda named David Davis is just now an interesting subject for medical doctors and doctors of divinity, says the Sun. He was a victim of the terrible explosion of Pen-y-Craig in 1880. He was bedridden for four years, recovered sufficiently to be able to go about, but was completely deaf and dumb. His doctor hit upon a novel plan to restore his hearing. He was placed by the side of a big gun during target practice. After the sixth shot his hearing came suddenly back to him, but he remained dumb. The other day one of his companions said something to him that put him in a towering passion, and his speech returned in a flood of profanity.

Talmage visited Gladstone at Hawarden last week, and the dispatch recording the event says they talked politics and religion. On the latter question Gladstone is reported to hav said: "Talk about questions of the day, there is but one question, and that is the gospel. It can and will correct everything needing correction. All men at the head of great movements are Christian men. During the many years I was in the cabinet I was brought into association with sixty master minds, and all but five of them were Christians. My only hope for the world is in bringing the human mind into contact with divine revelation." The Grand Old Man seems to be suffering from theological pessimism.

The way the Russian minister of the interior moves against an unsympathetic journal can be seen from a ministerial order which has just been issued, to the following effect: "Whereas the European Messenger in a whole series of articles conducts itself in no other way than in a spirit of condemnation of the most important acts of the government, and that the articles of M. Solevieff, published in that periodical, entitled, 'The History of Russian Conscience,' and containing exasperating criticisms directed against the Russian church and state, in their historical development, inculcate false ideas on the subject and shake respect for the principles of their foundation and for the principles of Russian nationality in general, the minister of the interior announces a first warning to the editor of the European Messenger in the person of the actual state councillor, Michael Stasoolevich."

The church Prohibitionists hav found a boomerang in their bill now before the South Dakota legislature. A dispatch from Pierre says: "A petition of Bishop W. H. Hare, of Sioux Falls, head of the Episcopal church in Dakota, was presented in both branches of the legislature yesterday, and caused considerable excitement, especially in the lobby of Prohibitionists. Bishop Hare emphatically protests against the adoption of the prohibition bill now before the legislature, which has every prospect of becoming a law, stating that it is too stringent in its provisions and stricter than there is any call for. Bishop Hare says the bill even interferes between the state and church, because it prohibits the use of wine for sacramental purposes. The bishop cites the Bible and other authorities to show that the use of fermented wine for sacramental purposes is right. He therefore prays that the Prohibition bill may not become a law, or, at least, that this obnoxious feature be stricken out. The pending bill is said to be the most stringent prohibition measure ever drawn up."

"Crimes against Criminals," was the subject of Colonel Ingersoll's address before the state Bar Association at Albany yesterday. During his address a fellow-lawyer committed the crime of annoying him by talking, and the colonel promptly crushed him. He told in the course of his remarks of the futil attempts to keep down vice by punishment, and declared that criminals should not be robbed, humiliated, or degraded, but should be treated with kindness and shown that the prison was a real reformatory. He said that convicts should be paid for their labor while in prison, declared that the tendency of the death penalty was to prevent conviction, and added: "The death penalty inflicted by the government is a perpetual excuse for mobs." He also said that tenements and flats and rented lands are the enemies of civilization; that ignorance, filth, and poverty are the missionaries of crime, and that so long as dishonorable success outranks honest effort, so long as society bows and cringes before the great thieves, there would be little ones enough to fill the jails. The colonel's radical views will probably set people to thinking.—World.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

CHAPTER XV.—Concluded.

Recapitulation and Conclusion.

The opinion of a writer, previously quoted in this work, is that the bitter war waged against the persons who hav declared that Lincoln was not a Christian arises, not from a belief that they hav stated what is false, but from a consciousness that they hav "demolished an empty shrine that was profitable to many, and broken a painted idol that might hav served for a god." It is strange how Christians tend toward fetichism. Not satisfied with three Gods, they must canonize and deify men and make saints and demi-gods. They hav already deified three Americans—Washington, Grant, and Lincoln—and what is remarkable, in each instance they hav selected an unbeliever—an Infidel. It is said that men hav stolen the livery of heaven in which to serve the devil; but it seems hardly consistent with the pretensions of the church that she should be compelled to appropriate the beadroll of Infidelity in order to make her appear respectable.

Lincoln's speeches and state papers contain many allusions to deity. As Colonel Lamon observes, "These were easy, and not inconsistent with his religious notions." But it is a mistake to attribute all the deistic expressions that appear in his state papers to him. Just how much of this was the work of his private secretaries, how much of it was "Seward's nonsense," or how much of it was suggested by Chase and other cabinet ministers, can never be determined. It is significant, however, that in those documents of least importance, those which he would most likely leave to his secretaries or other officials to draft, these expressions are chiefly to be found. In his debates with Douglas, and in his other great political speeches delivered in Illinois, he seldom refers to deity. In his carefully prepared Cooper Institute address, that model of political addresses, the name of deity does not once occur. In his First Inaugural Address, he refers to God, and makes a complimentary reference to Christianity intended to conciliate the church and gain for his administration its support in the coming struggle with the South. One paragraph of the Second Inaugural contains allusions to deity and quotations from the Bible; but in this address he makes no recognition of Christ or Christianity. Even his quotations from the Bible are made in a guarded manner which clearly indicates that he did not believe in its divinity. In the preliminary Proclamation of Emancipation, which was drafted by himself, the name of deity does not appear. In the final Proclamation, an acknowledgment of God was inserted only at the urgent request of Secretary Chase The Emancipation Proclamation, with the possible exception of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, is the most important political document ever issued in America. He knew that this was the crowning act of his career, that it would place him among the immortals. In the preparation of this work he expended much thought and labor, and it was his desire that it should be free from religious verbiage. In that masterpiece of eloquence, the Gettysburg oration, the name of God occurs but once, while not the remotest reference to Christianity or even immortality appears. When we take into consideration the fact that this address was made at the dedication of a cemetery, the significance of this omission cannot be overlooked. This speech was the product of Lincoln's own mind, free from the suggestions and emendations of others, and the occasion was too sacred to indulge in pious cant in which he did not believe.

The clergy parade Lincoln's recognitions of a supreme being as a triumphant refutation of the claim that he was an Infidel. Yet, at the same time, they do not hesitate to denounce as Infidels, Paine and Voltaire, when they know, or ought to know, that two more profound and reverential believers in God never lived and wrote than Paine and Voltaire.

If Infidelity and Atheism were synonymous terms it would be difficult to maintain that Lincoln, during the last years of his life at least, was an Infidel. But Infidelity and Atheism are not synonymous terms. An Atheist is an Infidel, but an Infidel is not necessarily an Atheist. A Presbyterian is a Christian, but all Christians are not Presbyterians. Christians themselvs coined the word Infidel and they hav used it to denote a disbeliever in Christianity. A disbelief or denial of Christianity is not necessarily a denial of God. Christians, many of them, regard the term as odious and as carrying with it the idea of immorality, notwithstanding the most intelligent and the most highly moral class in Christendom are these so-called Infidels. "Who are to-day's Infidels?" says the Rev. William Channing Gannett. He answers: "Very many of the brightest minds, the warmest hearts, the most loyal consciences, the most zealous seekers after God, the most honest tellers of what they find—yes, and the most successful finders. Infidels to what are they? Not to morality: Infidels to morality are too wise to train with them."

It is not claimed that Lincoln was wholly free from a belief in the supernatural. He possessed in some respects a simple, childlike nature, and carried with him through life some of the superstitions of childhood. But the dogmas of Christianity were not among them: these he had examined and discarded.

As a proof of Lincoln's regard for Christian institutions, great prominence is given to his proclamation to the army enjoining the observance of the Sabbath. This document givs expression to sentiments regarding the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath that Lincoln personally did not entertain. It was issued just prior to the close of the war, when victory was assured and the work of the army nearly completed, to appease the clamor of the clergy who demanded it, and was drafted, not by Lincoln, but by some pious Sabbatarian. Lincoln himself attached no more sanctity to Sunday than to other days. He worked on Sunday himself. In Springfield his Sundays were frequently spent in preparing cases for court. In company with his boys he often passed the entire day making excursions into the country or rambling through the woods that skirted the Sangamon. He seldom went to church either in Springfield or Washington, the claims of some of his Christian biographers to the contrary notwithstanding. Previous to his nomination, in 1860, we find him sitting for a bust on Sunday in preference to attending church. On the Sunday immediately following his nomination an artist was busy with him, molding his hands and taking negativs for a statue. The draft of the preliminary Proclamation of Emancipation was finished on Sunday. The last Sunday of his life was spent, not in studying the scriptures, but in reading his beloved Shakspere.

It was stated by friends of Lincoln that he generally refrained from giving publicity to his religious opinions while in public life because of their unpopularity. In answer to this the Christian claimant retorts: "If this be true then he was a hypocrit." But let us be honest. Nearly every person entertains opinions which he does not deem it discreet or necessary to make public. You, my Christian friend, entertain doubts and heresies concerning your creed which you keep a secret or disclose only to your most intimate associates. If you, in private life, and not dependent upon the public, hide your unpopular thoughts from the world, can you consistently blame Lincoln for his silence when the fate of a nation depended upon him and the alienation even of a few bigots might turn the scale against him? A Christian general does not hesitate to deceive the enemy or withhold his plans even from his own soldiers. Again, the clergy are forever advising and entreating men not to publish their doubts and heresies. Is it consistent in them to condemn a man for following their advice?

The church should learn to respect honesty herself before she charges others with dishonesty. It is the shame of Christianity that men hav been obliged to conceal their honest convictions in order to escape ostracism and persecution. When the church herself becomes honest enough to tolerate and respect the honest opinions of those who cannot conscientiously accept her creed, then will it be time for her to charge Lincoln with hypocrisy for having partially withheld his unpopular views from religious ruffians. It does not evince a want of honesty, nor even a lack of moral courage, to flee from a tiger or avoid a skunk.

This effort to prove that Lincoln was not a Christian will be condemned by many as an attempt to fasten a stain upon this great man's character. But the demonstration and perpetuation of this fact will only add to his greatness. It will show that he was in advance of his generation. The fame of Abraham Lincoln belongs not to this age alone but will endure for all time. The popular faith is transient and must perish. It is unpopular now to reject Christianity, but the day is fast approaching when to believe in its dogmas will be considered an evidence of human weakness. To perpetuate the claim that Lincoln was a Christian, is to perpetuate an idea that in a future age will lessen the luster of his name.

It will be urged by some that the intent and purpose of this work is solely to promote the interests of Freethought. But it is not. I advocate no cause that requires the prestige of a great name to make it respectable. The cause that requires the indorsement of the great to sustain it is not worthy to survive. I hav prosecuted this investigation, not in the interest of any belief or creed, but in the interest of truth; and truth is certainly as high as any creed, even if that creed be true.

To do good was Lincoln's religion. To liv an honest, manly life—to add to the sum of human happiness—to make the world better for his having lived—this was the aspiration of his life and the essence of his faith.

Upon his rugged honesty, I need not dwell. The sobriquet of "Honest Abe" was early won by him and never lost. In his profession—a profession in which, too often, cunning and deceit, falsehood and dishonesty, are the means, and robbery the end—a profession in which, too often, Injustice is a purpled Dives sitting at a bounteous board, and Justice, a ragged Lazarus lying at the gate—he never wavered in his loyalty to truth and honesty. Engaged in a just cause, he was one of the most powerful advocates that ever addressed a judge or jury; engaged in an unjust cause, he was the weakest member of his bar. In fact, he could not be induced to plead a cause in which he did not see some element of justice, even though the technicalities of law insured success. To one who had sought his services and had stated his case, he replied: "Yes, I can win it; but there are some things legally right that are not morally right; this is one; I cannot take your case." He was once employed to defend a person accused of murder. As the trial progressed, it became apparent to him that his client had done the deed. Turning to his associate counsel, with a look of disappointment and pain, he said: "Swett, the man is guilty; you defend him; I cannot." On another occasion, when he discovered that his client had grossly imposed upon his confidence and instituted an unjust suit, he left the court-room, and when the bailiff called for him, he answered: "Tell Judge Treat that I can't come; I hav to wash my hands."

In youth, the meanest creature found in him a friend, and if need be, a defender. He wrote essays and made speeches against cruelty to animals, and sought to impress upon his playmates' minds the sacredness of life. The same tender regard for the weak and the unfortunate characterized his manhood. While riding through a forest once with a party of friends, he saw a brood of young birds on the ground which a storm had blown from their nest. He dismounted from his horse, and after a laborious search, found the nest and placed the birdlings snugly in their little home. When he reached his companions, and was chided by them for his delay, he said: "I could not hav slept to-night if I had not given those birds to their mother."

In the social relations of life, he was a most exemplary man. He was a devoted husband, an indulgent father, an obliging neighbor, and a faithful friend. Mrs. Colonel Chapman, a lady who lived for a time in his family, pays this tribute to his private life: "He was all that a husband, father, and neighbor should be, kind and affectionate to his wife and child, and very pleasant to all around him. Never did I hear him utter an unkind word." "His devotion to wife and children," says George W. Julian, "was as abiding and unbounded as his love of country."

The strong attachment always manifested by him for his friends has often been remarked. Rich and poor, great and humble, all were equally dear to him and alike the recipients of his regard and love. The prince he treated like a man, the humblest man he treated like a prince. Nothing in his career exhibits the greatness and nobleness of his character in a loftier degree than the cordial and unaffected manner in which, at Washington, in the midst of wealth, and splendor, and refinement, he was accustomed to receive and entertain the plain, uncultured friends of other days.

A giant in stature, and a lion in strength and courage, he possessed the gentleness of a child and the tenderness of a woman. The sufferings, even of a stranger, would fill his eyes with tears, and the death of a friend would overwhelm him. In his tenth year his mother died, and for a time his heart was desolate and he could not be consoled. In his fifteenth year his only sister, a lovely, fragil flower, just blooming into womanhood, drooped and died, and life seemed purposeless to him again. Of his four children, two died while he was living—Eddie, a fair-haired babe, and his beloved Willie. When death took these his sorrow was unutterable. The untimely death of his young friend, the gallant Colonel Ellsworth, at Alexandria, and the death of his life-long friend, the lamented Edwin F. Baker, at Ball's Bluff, were blows that staggered him. At the death of his good friend, Bowlin Greene, he was chosen to deliver a funeral address. When the hour arrived, and he stepped forward to perform the sacred task, his eyes fell upon the coffin of his dead friend and for a time he stood transfixed—helpless and speechless. The only tribute he could pay was the tribute of his tears. When he turned for the last time from the bedside of the beautiful Ann Rutledge, his betrothed, it was with a broken heart and a mind dethroned. "Oh! I can never be reconciled to hav the snow, the rain, and the storm beat upon her grave," was the pitiful burden of his plaint for weeks. Reason after a time returned, but his wonted gladness never; and down through all those eventful years to that fatal April night when his own sweet lifeblood slowly oozed away, beneath that sparkling surface of feigned mirth drifted the memory and the agonies of that great grief.

He was the most magnanimous of men. William H. Seward, his chief opponent for the presidential nomination, he made the premier of his cabinet. Secretary Chase became his political, if not his personal, enemy. Yet, recognizing his fitness for the place, he waived all personal grievances and appointed him to the exalted position of chief justice of the United States, the highest gift within the power of a president to bestow. During his professional career he was sent to Cincinnati to assist Edwin M. Stanton in an important legal case. The grim Stanton had never met this plain, Western lawyer before, and displeased at his uncouth appearance, and apparent lack of ability, treated him so discourteously that Lincoln's self-respect compelled him to practically withdraw from the case. It was a brutal affront, too poignant for him ever to forget, but not to forgiv, and linked together on one of the most momentous pages of history stand the names of Lincoln and Stanton, an enduring witness to his sublime magnanimity.

The murder of this loving savior of our Union was a disastrous blow, not to the victorious North alone, but to the vanquished South as well. Could he hav lived, the balm of his great, kindly nature would hav quickly healed the nation's wounds. At the commencement of the conflict, in pleading tones, he said: "We are not enemies, but friends." And at its close, notwithstanding all the cruel, bitter anguish he had endured during those four long years of fratricidal strife, "With malice toward none, with charity for all," he died, and many a brave Confederate deplored

The deep damnation of his taking off.

When Stonewall Jackson died, he paid a touching tribute to his gallantry, and said: "Let us forget his errors over his fresh-made grave." In the darkness of night, on a bloody field of the Peninsula, he bent beside the prostrate form of a dying soldier of the South, and while the hot tears rolled down his furrowed cheeks, soothed him with words of tenderest sympathy, and, by the dim rays of a lantern, took down from his lips a message to his mother, and sent it by a flag of truce into the enemies' lines to be transmitted to his home.

The narration of his many deeds of kindness and mercy while at Washington would fill a volume. He loved to rescue an erring soldier boy from the jaws of death and fill a mother's eyes with tears of joy. He loved to dispel the clouds of sorrow from a wife's sad heart and warm it with the sunshine of happiness. He loved to take the child of poverty upon his knee and plant within its little breast the seeds of confidence and hope.

Glorious apostle of humanity! When shall we look upon his like again? so honest, so truthful, so just, so charitable, so loving, so merciful! Law was his God, justice his creed, and liberty his heaven. If he sinned, mercy prompted him. In the presence of such a man, and in the presence of such a religion, how contemptible your puny theologians and their narrow creeds appear!

Born in the cabin of a Western wild, dying in a nation's capital, its honored chief, enshrined in the hearts of an admiring world, Abraham Lincoln stands to day the gentlest, purest, noblest character in human history. Millenniums may pass away, unnumbered generations come and go, creeds rise and fall, but the divine faith of freedom's martyr, a faith based upon immutable law, eternal justice, universal liberty, a faith formulated not in perishable words, but in immortal deeds, will liv on through all the years to come, a torch of hope to every son of toil.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

Crimes Against Criminals.

In this brief address the object is to suggest, there being no time to present arguments at length. The subject has been chosen for the reason that it is one that should interest the legal profession, because that profession to a certain extent controls and shapes the legislation of our country and fixes definitly the scope and meaning of all laws.

Lawyers ought to be foremost in legislativ and judicial reform, and of all men they should understand the philosophy of mind, the causes of human action, and the real science of government.

It has been said that the three pests of a community are: A priest without charity, a doctor without knowledge, and a lawyer without a sense of justice.

I.

All nations seem to hav had supreme confidence in the deterrent power of threatened and inflicted pain. They hav regarded punishment as the shortest road to reformation. Imprisonment, torture, death, constituted a trinity under whose protection society might feel secure.

In addition to these, nations hav relied on confiscation and degradation, on maimings, whippings, brandings, and exposures to public ridicule and contempt. Connected with the court of justice was the chamber of torture. The ingenuity of man was exhausted in the construction of instruments that would surely reach the most sensitiv nerve. All this was done in the interest of civilization—for the protection of virtue and the well-being of states. Curiously enough, the fact is that, no matter how severe the punishments were, the crimes increased.

It was found that the penalty of death made little difference. Thieves and highwaymen, heretics and blasphemers, went on their way. It was then thought necessary to add to this penalty of death, and consequently the convicted were tortured in every conceivable way before execution. They were broken on the wheel—their joints dislocated on the rack. They were suspended by their legs and arms, while immense weights were placed upon their breasts. Their flesh was burnt and torn with hot irons. They were roasted at slow fires. They were buried alive, given to wild beasts; molten lead was poured in their ears—their eyelids were cut off and the wretches placed with their faces toward the sun—others were securely bound, so that they could move neither hand nor foot, and over their stomachs were placed inverted bowls; under these bowls rats were confined; on top of the bowls were heaped coals of fire, so that the rats in their efforts to escape would gnaw into the bowels of the victims. They were staked out on the sands of the sea, to be drowned by the slowly rising tide—and every means by which human nature can be overcome slowly, painfully, and terribly, were conceived and carried into execution. And yet the number of so-called criminals increased.

For petty offenses men were degraded—given to the mercy of the rabble. Their ears were cut off, their nostrils slit, their foreheads branded. They were tied to the tails of carts and flogged from one town to another. And yet, in spite of all, the poor wretches obstinately refused to become good and useful citizens.

Degradation has been thoroughly tried, with its maimings and brandings, and the result was that those who inflicted the punishments became as degraded as their victims.

Only a few years ago there were more than two hundred offenses in Great Britain punishable by death. The gallows-tree bore fruit through all the year, and the hangman was the busiest official in the kingdom—but the criminals increased.

Crimes were committed to punish crimes, and crimes were committed to prevent crimes. The world has been filled with prisons and dungeons, with chains and whips, with crosses and gibbets, with thumbscrews and racks, with hangmen and headsmen—and yet these frightful means and instrumentalities and crimes hav accomplished little for the preservation of property or life. It is safe to say that governments hav committed far more crimes than they hav prevented.

Why is it that men will suffer and risk so much for the sake of stealing? Why will they accept degradation and punishment and infamy as their portion? Some will answer this question by an appeal to the dogma of original sin; others by saying that millions of men and women are under the control of fiends—that they are actually possessed by devils; and others will declare that all these people act from choice—that they are possessed of free wills, of intelligence—that they know and appreciate consequences, and that, in spite of all, they deliberately prefer a life of crime.

II.

Hav we not advanced far enough intellectually to deny the existence of chance? Are we not satisfied now that back of every act and thought and dream and fancy is an efficient cause? Is anything, or can anything, be produced that is not necessarily produced? Can the fatherless and motherless exist? Is there not a connection between all events, and is not every act related to all other acts? Is it not possible, is it not probable, is it not true, that the actions of all men are determined by countless causes over which they hav no positiv control?

Certain it is that men do not prefer unhappiness to joy. It can hardly be said that man intends permanently to injure himself, and that he does what he does in order that he may liv a life of misery. On the other hand, we must take it for granted that man endeavors to better his own condition, and seeks, although by mistaken ways, his own well-being. The poorest man would like to be rich—the sick desire health—and no sane man wishes to win the contempt and hatred of his fellow-men. Every human being prefers liberty to imprisonment.

Are the brains of criminals exactly like the brains of honest men? Hav criminals the same ambitions, the same standards of happiness or of well-being? If a difference exists in the brain, will that, in part, account for the difference in character? Is there anything in heredity? Are vices as carefully transmitted by nature as virtues? Does each man in some degree bear burdens imposed by ancestors? We know that diseases of flesh and blood are transmitted—that the child is the heir of physical deformity. Are diseases of the brain—are deformities of the soul, of the mind, also transmitted?

We not only admit, but we assert, that in the physical world there are causes and effects. We insist that there is and can be no effect without an efficient cause. When anything happens in that world, we are satisfied that it was naturally and necessarily produced. The causes may be obscure, but we as implicitly believe in their existence as when we know positivly what they are. In the physical world we hav taken the ground that there is nothing miraculous—that everything is natural—and if we cannot explain it, we account for our inability to explain by our own ignorance. Is it not possible, is it not probable, that what is true in the physical world is equally true in the realm of mind—in that strange world of passion and desire? Is it possible that thoughts, or desires, or passions are the children of chance, born of nothing? Can we conceive of Nothing as a force, or as a cause? If, then, there is behind every thought and desire and passion an efficient cause, we can, in part at least, account for the actions of men.

A certain man under certain conditions acts in a certain way. There are certain temptations that he, with his brain, with his experience, with his intelligence, with his surroundings, cannot withstand. He is irresistibly led to do, or impelled to do, certain things; and there are other things that he cannot do. If we change the conditions of this man, his actions will be changed. Develop his mind, giv him new subjects of thought, and you change the man; and the man being changed, it follows as a necessity that his conduct will be different.

In civilized countries the struggle for existence is severe—the competition far sharper than in savage lands. The consequence is that there are many failures. These failures lack, it may be, opportunity or brain or moral force or industry or something without which, under the circumstances, success is impossible. Certain lines of conduct are called legal, and certain others criminal, and the men who fail in one line may be driven to the other. How do we know that it is possible for all people to be honest? Are we certain that all people can tell the truth? Is it possible for all men to be generous or candid or courageous?

I am perfectly satisfied that there are millions of people incapable of committing certain crimes, and it may be true that there are millions of others incapable of practicing certain virtues. We do not blame a man because he is not a sculptor, a poet, a painter, or a statesman. We say he has not the genius. Are we certain that it does not require genius to be good? Where is the man with intelligence enough to take into consideration the circumstances of each individual case? Who has the mental balance with which to weigh the forces of heredity, of want, of temptation, and who can analyze with certainty the mysterious motions of the brain? Where and what are the sources of vice and virtue? In what obscure and shadowy recesses of the brain are passions born? And what is it that for the moment destroys the sense of right and wrong? Who knows to what extent reason becomes the prisoner of passion—of some strange and wild desire, the seeds of which were sown, it may be, thousands of years ago in the breast of some savage? To what extent do antecedents and surroundings affect the moral sense?

Is it not possible that the tyranny of governments, the injustice of nations, the fierceness of what is called the law, produce in the individual a tendency in the same direction? Is it not true that the citizen is apt to imitate his nation? Society degrades its enemies—the individual seeks to degrade his. Society plunders its enemies, and now and then a citizen has the desire to plunder his. Society kills its enemies, and possibly sows in the heart of some citizen the seeds of murder.

III.

Is it not true that the criminal is a natural product, and that society unconsciously produces these children of vice? Can we not safely take another step, and say that the criminal is a victim, as the diseased and insane and deformed are victims? We do not think of punishing a man because he is afflicted with disease—our desire is to find a cure. We send him, not to the penitentiary, but to the hospital, to an asylum. We do this because we recognize the fact that disease is naturally produced—that it is inherited from parents, or the result of unconscious negligence, or it may be of recklessness—but instead of punishing, we pity. If there are diseases of the mind, of the brain, as there are diseases of the body, and if these diseases of the mind, these deformities of the brain, produce, and necessarily produce, what we call vice, why should we punish the criminal, and pity those who are physically diseased?

Socrates, in some respects at least one of the wisest of men, said: "It is strange that you should not be angry when you meet a man with an ill-conditioned body, and yet be vexed when you encounter one with an ill-conditioned soul."

We know that there are deformed bodies, and we are equally certain that there are deformed minds.

Of course, society has the right to protect itself, no matter whether the persons who attack its well-being are responsible or not, no matter whether they are sick in mind or deformed in brain. The right of self-defense exists, not only in the individual, but in society. The great question is, How shall this right of self-defense be exercised? What spirit shall be in the nation or in society—the spirit of revenge, a desire to degrade and punish and destroy, or a spirit born of the recognition of the fact that criminals are victims?

The world has thoroughly tried confiscation, degradation, imprisonment, torture, and death, and thus far the world has failed. In this connection I call your attention to the following statistics gathered in our own country:

In 1850, we had 23,000,000 of people, and between six and seven thousand prisoners.

In 1860, 31,000,000 of people and 19,000 prisoners.

In 1870, 38,000,000 of people and 32,000 prisoners.

In 1880, 50,000,000 of people and 58,000 prisoners.

It may be curious to note the relation between insanity, pauperism, and crime:

In 1850, there were 15,000 insane; in 1860, 24,000; in 1870, 37,000; in 1880, 91,000.

In the light of these statistics, we are not succeeding in doing away with crime. There were in 1880 58,000 prisoners, and in the same year 57,000 homeless children, and 66,000 paupers in almshouses.

Is it possible that we must go to the same causes for these effects?

IV.

There is also another side to this question. A punishment that degrades the punished will degrade the man who inflicts the punishment, and will degrade the government that procures the infliction. The whipping-post pollutes, not only the whipped, but the whipper, and not only the whipper, but the community at large. Wherever its shadow falls it degrades.

If, then, there is no reforming power in degradation—no deterrent power—for the reason that the degradation of the criminal degrades the community, and in this way produces more criminals, then the next question is, Whether there is any reforming power in torture? The trouble with this is that it hardens and degrades to the last degree the ministers of the law. Those who are not affected by the agonies of the bad will in a little time care nothing for the sufferings of the good. There seems to be a little of the wild beast in men—a something that is fascinated by suffering and that delights in inflicting pain. When a government tortures it is in the same state of mind that the criminal was when he committed his crime. It requires as much malice in those who execute the law to torture a criminal as it did in the criminal to torture and kill his victim. The one was a crime by a person, the other by a nation.

There is something in injustice, in cruelty, that tends to defeat itself. There were never as many traitors in England as when the traitor was drawn and quartered—when he was tortured in every possible way—when his limbs, torn and bleeding, were given to the fury of mobs or exhibited pierced by pikes or hung in chains. These frightful punishments produced intense hatred of the government, and traitors continued to increase until they became powerful enough to decide what treason was and who the traitors were and to inflict the same torments on others.

The other day I was asked these questions: "Has there been as much heroism displayed for the right as for the wrong? Has virtue had as many martyrs as vice?"

For hundreds of years the world has endeavored to destroy the good by force. The expression of honest thought was regarded as the greatest of crimes. Dungeons were filled by the noblest and the best, and the blood of the bravest was shed by the sword or consumed by flame. It was impossible to destroy the longing in the heart of man for liberty and truth. Is it not possible that brute force and cruelty and revenge, imprisonment, torture, and death are as impotent to do away with vice as to destroy virtue?

To me it has always been a mystery how the average man, knowing something of the weakness of human nature, something of the temptations to which he himself has been exposed—remembering the evil of his life, the things he would hav done had there been opportunity, had he absolutely known that discovery would be impossible—should hav feelings of hatred toward the imprisoned.

Is it possible that the average man assaults the criminal in a spirit of self-defense? Does he wish to convince his neighbors that the evil thought and impulse were never in his mind? Are his words a shield that he uses to protect himself from suspicion? For my part, I sympathize sincerely with all failures, with the victims of society, with those who hav fallen, with the imprisoned, with the hopeless, with those who hav been stained by verdicts of guilty, and with those who in the moment of passion hav destroyed, as with a blow, the future of their lives.

How perilous, after all, is the state of man! It is the work of a life to build a great and splendid character. It is the work of a moment to destroy it utterly, from turret to foundation-stone. How cruel hypocrisy is!

V.

Is there any remedy? Can anything be done for the reformation of the criminal? He should be treated with kindness. Every right should be given him, consistent with the safety of society. He should neither be degraded nor robbed. The state should set the highest and noblest example. The powerful should never be cruel, and in the breast of the supreme there should be no desire for revenge.

All will admit that the industrious must be protected. In this world it is necessary to work. Labor is the foundation of all prosperity. Larceny is the enemy of industry. Society has the right to protect itself. The question is, Has it the right to punish?—has it the right to degrade?—or should it endeavor to reform the convict?

A man is taken to the penitentiary. He is clad in the garments of a convict. He is degraded—he loses his name—he is designated by a number. He is no longer treated as a human being—he becomes the slave of the state. Nothing is done for his improvement—nothing for his reformation. He is driven like a beast of burden; robbed of his labor; leased, it may be, by the state to a contractor, who gets out of his hands, out of his muscles, out of his poor brain, all the toil that he can. He is not allowed to speak with a fellow-prisoner. At night he is alone in his cell. The relations that should exist between men are destroyed. He is a convict. He is no longer worthy to associate even with his keepers. The jailor is immensely his superior, and the man who turns the key upon him at night regards himself, in comparison, as a model of honesty, of virtue and manhood. The convict is pavement on which those who watch him walk. He remains for the time of his sentence, and when that expires he goes forth a branded man. He is given money enough to pay his fare back to the place from whence he came.

What is the condition of this man? Can he get employment? Not if he honestly states who he is and where he has been. The first thing he does is to deny his personality, to assume a name. He endeavors by telling falsehoods to lay the foundation for future good conduct. The average man does not wish to employ an ex-convict, because the average man has no confidence in the reforming power of the penitentiary. He believes that the convict who comes out is worse than the convict who went in. He knows that in the penitentiary the heart of this man has been hardened—that he has been subjected to the torture of perpetual humiliation—that he has been treated like a ferocious beast; and so he believes that this ex-convict has in his heart hatred for society, that he feels he has been degraded and robbed. Under these circumstances, what avenue is open to the ex-convict? If he changes his name, there will be some detectiv, some officer of the law, some meddlesome wretch, who will betray his secret. He is then discharged. He seeks employment again, and he must seek it by again telling what is not true. He is again detected, and again discharged. And finally he becomes convinced that he cannot liv as an honest man. He naturally drifts back into the society of those who hav had a like experience; and the result is that in a little while he again stands in the dock, charged with the commission of another crime. Again he is sent to the penitentiary—and this is the end. He feels that his day is done, that the future has only degradation for him.

VI.

Why should the state take without compensation the labor of these men, and why should they, after having been imprisoned for years, be turned out without the means of support? Would it not be far better, far more economical, to pay these men for their labor, to lay aside their earnings from day to day, from month to month, and from year to year—to put their money at interest, so that when the convict is released after five years of imprisonment he will hav several hundred dollars of his own—not merely money enough to pay his way back to the place from which he was sent, but enough to make it possible for him to commence business on his own account, enough to keep the wolf of crime from the door of his heart.

Suppose the convict comes out with five hundred dollars. This would be to most of that class a fortune. It would form a breastwork, a fortress, behind which the man could fight temptation. This would giv him food and raiment, enable him to go to some other state or country where he could redeem himself. If this was done, thousands of convicts would feel under immense obligation to the government. They would think of the penitentiary as the place in which they were saved—in which they were redeemed—and they would feel that the verdict of guilty rescued them from the abyss of crime. Under these circumstances, the law would appear beneficent, and the heart of the poor convict, instead of being filled with malice, would overflow with gratitude. He would see the propriety of the course pursued by the government. He would recognize and feel and experience the benefits of his course, and the result would be good, not only to him, but to the nation as well.

VII.

There are, however, men who pursue crime as a vocation—as a profession—men who hav been convicted again and again, and who still persist in using the liberty of intervals to prey upon the rights of others. What shall be done with these men and women?

Put one thousand hardened thieves on an island—compel them to produce what they eat and use—and I am almost certain that a large majority would be opposed to theft. Those who worked would not permit those who did not to steal the result of their labor. In other words, self-preservation would be the dominant idea, and these men would instantly look upon the idlers as the enemies of their society.

Such a community would be self-supporting. Let women of the same class be put by themselvs. Keep the sexes absolutely apart. Those who are beyond the power of reformation should not hav the liberty to reproduce themselvs. Those who cannot be reached by kindness—by justice—those who under no circumstances are willing to do their share, should be separated. They should dwell apart, and dying, should leave no heirs.

What shall be done with the slayers of their fellowmen—with murderers? Shall the nation take life?

It has been contended that the death penalty deters others—that it has far more terror than imprisonment for life. What is the effect of the example set by a nation? Is not the tendency to harden and degrade not only those who inflict and those who witness, but the entire community as well?

A few years ago a man was hanged in Alexandria, Virginia. One who witnessed the execution, on that very day, murdered a pedler in the Smithsonian grounds at Washington. He was tried and executed, and one who witnessed his hanging went home, and on the same day murdered his wife.

The tendency of the extreme penalty is to prevent conviction. In the presence of death it is easy for a jury to find a doubt. Technicalities become important, and absurdities, touched with mercy, hav the appearance for a moment of being natural and logical. Honest and conscientious men dread a final and irrevocable step. If the penalty were imprisonment for life, the jury would feel that if any mistake were made it could be rectified; but where the penalty is death a mistake is fatal. A conscientious man takes into consideration the defects of human nature—the uncertainty of testimony, and the countless shadows that dim and darken the understanding, and refuses to find a verdict that, if wrong, cannot be righted.

The death penalty, inflicted by the government, is a perpetual excuse for mobs.

VIII.

If we are to change the conduct of men, we must change their conditions. Extreme poverty and crime go hand in hand. Destitution multiplies temptations and destroys the finer feelings. The bodies and souls of men are apt to be clad in like garments. If the body is covered with rags, the soul is generally in the same condition. Self-respect is gone—the man looks down—he has neither hope nor courage. He becomes sinister—he envies the prosperous—hates the fortunate, and despises himself.

. . . . . .

We need not repeat the failures of the Old World. To divide lands among successful generals, or among favorits of the crown, to giv vast estates for services rendered in war, is no worse than to allow men of great wealth to purchase and hold vast tracts of land. The result is precisely the same—that is to say, a nation composed of a few landlords and of many tenants—the tenants resorting from time to time to mob violence, and the landlords depending upon a standing army. The property of no man, however, should be taken for either private or public use without just compensation and in accordance with law. There is in the state what is known as the right of eminent domain. The state reserves to itself the power to take the land of any private citizen for a public use, paying to that private citizen a just compensation to be legally ascertained. When a corporation wishes to build a railway, it exercises this right of eminent domain, and where the owner of land refuses to sell a right of way, or land for the establishment of stations or shops, and the corporation proceeds to condemn the land to ascertain its value, and when the amount thus ascertained is paid, the property vests in the corporation. This power is exercised because in the estimation of the people the construction of a railway is a public good.

I believe that this power should be exercised in another direction. It will be well, as it seems to me, for the legislature to fix the amount of land that a private citizen may own, that will not be subject to be taken for the use of which I am about to speak. The amount to be thus held will depend upon many local circumstances, to be decided by each state for itself. Let me suppose that the amount of land that may be held by a farmer for cultivation has been fixed at one hundred and sixty acres—and suppose that A has several thousand acres. B wishes to buy one hundred and sixty acres or less of this land, for the purpose of making himself a home. A refuses to sell. Now, I believe that the law should be so that B can invoke this right of eminent domain, and file his petition, hav the case brought before a jury, or before commissioners, who shall hear the evidence and determin the value, and on the payment of the amount the land shall belong to B.

I would extend the same law to lots and houses in cities and villages—the object being to fill our country with the owners of homes, so that every child shall hav a fireside, every father and mother a roof, provided they hav the intelligence, the energy, and the industry to acquire the necessary means.

Tenements and flats and rented land are, in my judgment, the enemies of civilization. They make the rich richer and the poor poorer. They put a few in palaces, but they put many in prisons.

IX.

No one places a higher value upon the free school than I do; and no one takes greater pride in the prosperity of our colleges and universities. But at the same time, much that is called education simply unfits men successfully to fight the battle of life. Thousands are to-day studying things that will be of exceedingly little importance to them or to others. Much valuable time is wasted in studying languages that long ago were dead, and histories in which there is no truth.

There was an idea in the olden time—and it is not yet dead—that whoever was educated ought not to work; that he should use his head and not his hands. Graduates were ashamed to be found engaged in manual labor, in plowing fields, in sowing or in gathering grain. To this manly kind of independence they preferred the garret and the precarious existence of an unappreciated poet, borrowing their money from their friends and their ideas from the dead. The educated regarded the useful as degrading—they were willing to stain their souls to keep their hands white.

In all the schools children should be taught to work in wood and iron, to understand the construction and use of machinery, to become acquainted with the great forces that man is using to do his work. The present system of education teaches names, not things. It is as though we should spend years in learning the names of cards, without playing a game.

In this way boys would learn their aptitudes—would ascertain what they were fitted for—what they could do. It would not be a guess or an experiment, but a demonstration. Education should increase a boy's chances for getting a living. The real good of it is to get food and roof and raiment, opportunity to develop the mind and the body and liv a full and ample life.

The more real education, the less crime—and the more homes, the fewer prisons.

X.

The fear of punishment may deter some, the fear of exposure others; but there is no real reforming power in fear or punishment. Men cannot be tortured into greatness, into goodness. All this, as I said before, has been thoroughly tried. The idea that punishment was the only relief, found its limit, its infinit, in the old doctrin of eternal pain; but the believers in that dogma stated distinctly that the victims never would be, and never could be, reformed.

As men become civilized they become capable of greater pain and of greater joy. To the extent that the average man is capable of enjoying or suffering, to that extent he has sympathy with others. The average man, the more enlightened he becomes, the more apt he is to put himself in the place of another. He thinks of his prisoner, of his employee, of his tenant—and he even thinks beyond these: he thinks of the community at large. As man becomes civilized he takes more and more into consideration circumstances and conditions. He gradually loses faith in the old ideas and theories that every man can do as he wills, and in the place of the word "wills" he puts the word "must." The time comes to the intelligent man when in the place of punishments he thinks of consequences, results—that is to say, not something inflicted by some other power, but something necessarily growing out of what is done. The clearer men perceive the consequences of actions, the better they will be. Behind consequences we place no personal will, and consequently do not regard them as inflictions or punishments. Consequences, no matter how severe they may be, create in the mind no feeling of resentment, no desire for revenge. We do not feel bitterly toward the fire because it burns, or the frost that freezes, or the flood that overwhelms, or the sea that drowns—because we attribute to these things no motivs, good or bad. So, when through the development of the intellect man perceives not only the nature but the absolute certainty of consequences, he refrains from certain actions, and this may be called reformation through the intellect—and surely there is no better reformation than this. Some may be, and probably millions hav been, reformed through kindness, through gratitude—made better in the sunlight of charity. In the atmosphere of kindness the seeds of virtue burst into bud and flower. Cruelty, tyranny, brute force, do not and cannot by any possibility better the heart of man. He who is forced upon his knees has the attitude, but never the feeling, of prayer.

XI.

All the penalties, all the punishments, are inflicted under a belief that man can do right under all circumstances—that his conduct is absolutely under his control, and that his will is a pilot that can, in spite of winds and tides, reach any port desired. All this is, in my judgment, a mistake. It is a denial of the integrity of nature. It is based upon the supernatural and miraculous, and as long as this mistake remains the corner-stone of criminal jurisprudence reformation will be impossible.

We must take into consideration the nature of man—the facts of mind—the power of temptation—the limitations of the intellect—the force of habit—the result of heredity—the power of passion—the domination of want—the diseases of the brain—the tyranny of appetite—the cruelty of conditions—the results of association—the effects of poverty and wealth, of helplessness and power.

Until these subtle things are understood—until we know that man, in spite of all, can certainly pursue the highway of the right, society should not impoverish and degrade, should not chain and kill, those who, after all, may be the helpless victims of unknown causes that are deaf and blind.

We know something of ourselvs—of the average man—of his thoughts, passions, fears, and aspirations—something of his sorrows and his joys, his weakness, his liability to fall—something of what he resists—the struggles, the victories and the failures of his life. We know something of the tides and currents of the mysterious sea—something of the circuits of the wayward winds—but we do not know where the wild storms are born that wreck and rend. Neither do we know in what strange realm the mists and clouds are formed that dim and darken all the heaven of the mind, nor from whence comes the tempest of the brain in which the will to do, sudden as the lightning's flash, seizes and holds the man until the dreadful deed is done that leaves a curse upon the soul.

We do not know. Our ignorance should make us hesitate. Our weakness should make us merciful.

I cannot more fittingly close this address than by quoting the prayer of the Buddhist: "I pray thee to hav pity on the vicious—thou hast already had pity on the virtuous by making them so."

R. G. Ingersoll.

The Coming Convention of Liberal Women.

There is a movement on foot to assemble the prominent Liberal women of the country in Washington, on February 24th and 25th, in a convention to be held for purposes of organization.

The hour is eminently ripe for such a movement. For some time past our orthodox brethren and sisters—especially the sisters—not satisfied with their legitimate churchly works of mercy and peace, and the right (inherent in every human being) to moral suasion, hav assumed an aggressiv position, and are seeking to cram their religious opinions by main force down the throats of those who differ with them. By a resolution of the late Chicago convention, the Women's Christian Temperance Union women declared that Christ should be recognized in our laws as the king of nations, and by this and by similar utterances, they hav placed themselvs in line with the American Sabbath Union, with the advocates of the Blair and Breckenridge bills, and, in short, with all the various branches of that God-in-the-Constitution party who are planning to destroy the corner-stone of our republic—i.e., religious liberty.

When the women of a community hav been once roused to concerted action upon any moral question, their success is usually but a matter of time. Unlike men, they are not, as a rule, held in check by business or political considerations. The training of centuries, which has stimulated the feminin emotional nature out of all proportion to its intellectual, has also compelled it to seek an outlet along higher levels only. The result is, that, when once it precipitates itself from these high tablelands upon the brutality, the immorality, or other wickedness along the lower levels, it does so with an appalling and well-nigh irresistible torrent that sweeps everything before it. We hav a striking example in this same Women's Christian Temperance movement, which is now sweeping over our country in an ever-deepening flood. One by one the old bulwarks of intemperance totter and fall before our eyes, and it looks just now as though every saloon, with its baleful influence, were doomed to final submersion and overthrow by the raging waters.

But, alas! the flood does not cease here. Mingled with this torrent of righteous indignation are powerful currents of church fanaticism, which already threaten the very foundations of religious liberty upon which our republic rests—currents which are making themselvs felt by the unconscious help of the flood of philanthropy along whose channel they run.

It is against such fanaticism as this, that the Liberal women of the country are called to organize in February. And it is to be hoped that our thoughtful and broad-minded women everywhere will respond to this call, in so far as they are able.

The time has come when the irregular, guerrilla warfare of Liberals must be replaced by coöperation and disciplin, if any really effectiv battle is to be waged against ecclesiastical aggression. Liberal Leagues and Radical clubs are all well enough, as far as they go. They cultivate the intellectual side of Liberalism, and furnish a place of exchange for progressiv thought. But, as to influencing the emotional nature of the community in favor of Liberalism, they are almost useless.

We can learn a lesson from our orthodox brethren in this matter. What has been the secret of their success?

Certainly not their numerical strength, as compared with the numbers of non-churchgoers. The most hopeful among them admit that but a small minority of the older business men are activ sympathizers; that but from seven to ten per cent of the young men in a community are church-members; and that but from fifteen to seventeen per cent of young men ever see the inside of a church. The majority of the mature male population are non-churchgoers. The main dependence of the orthodox church is upon its women; there being, according to a recent speech by Mrs. Mary T. Lathrop before the Women's Christian Temperance Union, but one man to four or six women at the regular church services, and but one man to fourteen or fifteen women at prayer-meetings. The reason for this predominance of women over men in church work probably lies in what we hav indicated above—that the training of women through long centuries has compelled an emotional outlet along higher levels only. But, whatever the cause, the fact is indisputable that it is the women who hav carried on both the philanthropy and the devoteeism—in short, the emotional work—of the orthodox church. And of late years, since its women hav learned organization and business methods, the church has advanced with giant strides. Like the Democratic party in politics, these orthodox women "vote solidly." And they work solidly, too, each woman doing her level best for the church she believes in—be that best little or much—and acting with her fellow-women under some accredited leader. Under this leadership, they get up tea-parties, tableaux, fairs, and entertainments of various kinds, and work like Trojans, well content if they "make" but a very few dollars above the general expenses; they sell tickets, distribute circulars and tracts, besiege rich people until the purse-strings are loosened, organize "lend-a-hand" clubs among the boys and girls, and keep the young men and women going at some sort of delightful social coadjutorship which shall finally bring in money or recruits for "the cause." It is little wonder that all this energy, this faithfulness in detail work, this organization under competent leadership, should win so many orthodox successes.

Compared with their sisters in the church, what are our Liberal women doing? Almost nothing.

It is high time that women outside of orthodoxy awakened to the sense of their powers, as hav already their sisters within the pale of the church. It is high time that they realized the mission to which they are called in this nineteenth century, and which they alone can accomplish—the carrying of the human race not alone upward, as their orthodox sisters are seeking to do, but forward to the broader sweep and clearer outlook of Liberalism.

It is for this purpose that the convention of Liberal women is called in February. And it is to be hoped that every one of our women will do her best to help along that purpose.

Whether the convention will elect to organize independently of previous societies, or to form an auxiliary branch of some one of those already activ, remains to be seen. The auxiliary plan has much in its favor; and, if this meet with the convention's approval, it seems as though the American Secular Union might confidently expect to be the one with which our Liberal women would hasten to ally themselvs. The American Secular Union has three things especially to commend itself as a rallying-point for the new society:

1. The nine principles which it advocates, and which are lineal descendants of the famous Nine Demands of Secularism.

2. That "non-partisan clause" in its constitution, whereby it "welcomes all persons, of whatever faith or party, to its membership, on the basis of 'no union of church and state.'"

3. Its article on "Local Auxiliary Societies," which states that such organizations "shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their affairs," and that "the effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient coöperation of the freest kind with the American Secular Union and with other local societies."

The Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia will celebrate Paine's birthday on Sunday, February 2d, instead of January 29th. Mr. Longford writes that good talent and music hav been secured, and that Liberals in and near Philadelphia are cordially invited.

The Manhattan Liberal Club will be addressed on Friday evening, January 31st, by Prof. Thomas W. Organ, on the "Fallacies of Modern Liberalism Concerning Prohibition." The Liberals of the city are invited to attend, learn what are their fallacies, and reform their ways.

The Origin of Christmas.*

The word "Christmas" contains in itself evidence of its derivation from the liturgical nomenclature of Romish sacerdotalism. Christ-mas—the mass of Christ—that peculiar priestly hocus-pocus under which it is said that the eucharistic wafer is transubstantiated into the body of Jesus, the Christ.

The institution of this mass is accredited to Pope Telesphorus, in the second Christian century. At first it was what the almanac calls a "moveable feast," like Good Friday and Easter, and was often confounded with the Epiphany, and was celebrated by the eastern churches in April and May. In the fourth century Pope Julius I. ordered an investigation into the particular date of the birth of Jesus, and the result of this inquiry was the conclusion that he was born the 25th of December.

It is hardly necessary to say that this is a matter of mere arbitrary conjecture, as nothing is certainly known concerning the day or even the year of the birth of Jesus. Among celebrated Christian writers one hundred and thirty-three different opinions hav been expressed as to the time of the so-called nativity, and the latest conclusion of the best scholarship is that nothing is certainly known on this subject, and that the chronology of the first four hundred years of the Christian era is unreliable, as no permanent or trustworthy records were kept.

The first intimation that we hav that there was anything uncommon in the birth of Jesus, is found in the epistle of Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, who lived in the early part of the second century (A.D. 107). Modern history givs an account of a most extraordinary epistolary correspondence between this bishop and the Virgin Mary, though it detracts somewhat from its claim to genuinness that these letters were first published in Paris in 1495.

The gospels ascribed to Matthew and Luke alone teach the doctrin of the divine parentage and miraculous birth of Jesus, and as they were first known between the years 170 and 180, of course the story of Ignatius was of earlier date. It is a suggestiv fact that Ignatius presided in Antioch, of Syria, and that province was imbued with the religious ideas of the Persians, who held that Zoroaster, their great prophet, had been immaculately conceived by a ray of the divine reason, and that Mithra, their incarnated deity, was miraculously begotten and born of a virgin mother. . . .

It must not be supposed, as has been intimated, that the church of Rome, in fixing the 25th of December as the time for celebrating the birth of Jesus, did so because she had reliable information as to this date. She must hav had some other reason for fixing her Christmas festivities at this particular time. And now it is right to recognize the well-established fact that at the precise time in each year corresponding with the 25th day of the 12th month, from the earliest periods of which history givs any account, all nations hav been accustomed to hold festivities very similar to the Christmas rites of the Romish church. So far from the truth is the idea that celebrations now known as Christmas holidays are less than nineteen hundred years old, similar, if not identical celebrations were held thousands of years before the infant Moses was rescued from the ark of bulrushes, or the young child of Mary received "gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh."

In Buddhistic temples, before the dawn of consecutiv chronology, on Hindoo plains on the 25th of December, thousands and thousands of years ago, festivities similar to our modern Christmas were celebrated. Houses were illuminated and made bright with gilt paper and gay colors, and garlands of evergreen and flowers were seen in every direction, while friends congratulated each other with good wishes, and presents were exchanged among friends and relativs.

In the Chinese sacred books we hav similar accounts of the most gorgeous celebrations held on the 25th day of the twelfth month.

Celebrations still more imposing were held on the 25th day of December among the ancient Persians, long, long before the sorrowful times when the Hebrew captivs sat by the rivers of Babylon and mingled their tears with the turgid waters, "and wept as they remembered Zion!"

Festivities in honor of Osiris and Isis, and their son Horus, were celebrated in Egypt, long before the emigration of Joseph and Jacob, and when the Pyramids were young, and that too on the 25th of December.

It would take up all the time allotted to this paper to giv even a brief notice of the oriental nations of antiquity who celebrated (from pre-historic times) the 25th of December, with religious and social ceremonies more or less magnificent and gorgeous —running down through the Bacchanalian festivities of Greece and the Saturnalia of pagan Rome, until after and since the commencement of the Christian era.

Now the questions come up, in every rational mind, what was the origin of these winter festivities, and why were they uniformly observed on the 25th day of the twelfth month? There must hav been some common understanding among these remote peoples —some reason upon which the custom was based. Some light will pour in upon this subject when we consider the fact, that these celebrations were all held in commemoration of the alleged birth of a divine man, having a supernatural father and a human virgin mother. Sakia and Christna, and other Indian incarnations, all had virgin mothers, and so had the hero-gods of Egypt, Persia, Greece, Rome, Thibet, and Mexico. The virgin mother of the savior of the Druids, more than two thousand years ago, had a crown of twelve stars upon her head, and her foot was placed upon the head of a serpent, and the same devices are found engraved in the stone cave temples of India, made thousands of years ago. What does it all mean? What is the real source of these uniform legends, which place the birth of a god on the 25th of December, and make them all so much alike?

These questions can only be answered in the study of comparativ religions. A large class of learned writers favor the hypothesis that all systems of theology, ancient and modern, are suggestions of the phenomena of physical nature, postulated by poets and philosophers long before the Christian era.

Primitiv peoples, leading pastoral lives in the open air by night and day, were very naturally first led to worship the sun, and to trace his relations to other celestial orbs. As intelligence increased, and some men excelled others, the contemplativ few came to regard the sun as the best emblem of the creativ, animating, fecundating spirit of the universe, while the many could only see the material emblem. It was the habit of the oriental mind to personify almost everything. It veiled all lessons in allegory, and draped all knowledge with symbols. It invented mythic stories and poetic and fantastic tales, which, though known to be fanciful by the philosophers, came to be regarded by the common people as historical truths.

The rule was to personify the sun under the form of a benefactor to mankind, and to narrate his annual career as a moral and philosophic tale. The Persian Magians accounted to the populace for the introduction of evil into the world by a fable of a serpent tempting the first woman to pluck a forbidden apple. This act, as the apple ripens late in autumn, was of course followed by the prevalence of winter, with darkness and cold—the kingdom of the evil principle —and necessitated the adoption of clothing. The mischief thus brought about could only be remedied by the agency of the sun, which they identified with the principle of good.

The day assigned to the birth of the sun-gods of all ancient religions was the same as that assigned by the church to Christmas. The shortest day being December 21st, the birth of Christ is put on the 25th, the first day that shows any elongation; while the lowest point, which might excite doubt, is assigned to the doubting apostle, Thomas.

The rule in the calendar is to dedicate to some saint the day of the sun's entry into a new sign; and, as pointed out by St. Augustine in his sermon on the nativity of St. John, the saying of the Baptist herald of the sun that is to be—"He must increase, but I must decrease"—procured for him his place in the calendar as lord of the waning year, for his festival is held June 24th, the last day of the summer solstice, and that from which the days begin to decrease.

The point here to be made is this: that the Roman breviary, and in short the calendars of all ritualistic churches, are based upon the Astronomical religion of the ancient pagans, and that Christmas is no exception to this rule. Take a catalog of all the festivals and saints'-days of Romanism and Episcopacy, and with no other guide than a common almanac, you may get a hint as to the origin of every one of them.

The facts as herein stated are not a recent discovery, much less a modern invention, as they were acknowledged by poets, philosophers, and historians in olden times, and by none more distinctly than by the early Christian fathers. Pages in proof might be filled with quotations from Tertullian, Justin, Jerome, Augustine, and scores of other writers, some of whom distinctly admit that the pagans derived their theology from the fables of the Solar worship, Tertullian conveniently disposing of the fact that in many things the heathen anticipated the dogmas of Christian theology, by saying that the devil introduced and taught them to forestall the religion of Christ, strangely ignoring the fact that the Jews knew nothing of devils or angels until after their captivity among the Mithraic worshipers of the sun-god in Babylon.

The streaming rays of the sun's glory in paintings around the heads of the Hindoo Christna, the Grecian Apollo, and of the Catholic Jesus, are very suggestiv of the sun-worship, and our modern churches show their ignorance and folly by the prominence they giv it in their decorations and symbols. The intelligent observer sees evidence of the sun and fire worship, as also of the serpent and phallic worship, on every hand among Christians, especially in the Catholic churches, and wonders at the prevailing ignorance and superstition. The decorations of Christmas and Easter, with their special services, all point to the Solar worship, while the May-pole, the hot cross-buns, the mystic horse-shoe, and even church steeples, if properly understood, would bring the blush of shame to modest cheeks.

Almost everybody knows, in our day, that Catholic priestly robes are all of pagan origin, but it is not so generally known that the "shad-belly" coat of our worthy Quakers was borrowed from the Chaldean priests, who wore a head-gear and garments representing the body of a fish—doubtless suggested by the Zodiacal sign "Pisces," the Fishes.

Nothing can be said against the good-cheer and merry-making of the Christmas holidays, but we should not allow the priestly powers to palm them upon the world for what they are not. It is well to study the gospels, and with them, the Bibles of the ages—the religions of all nations and peoples—but we must discriminate between legend and history, between dogma and doctrin. . . . Here, if nowhere else, the fact may be emphasized, that our modern Christmas is a Christian feast of pagan parentage.

Gibbon in his "Decline and Fall," says: "The Roman Christians, ignorant of the real time of the birth of Jesus, fixed the solemn festival on the 25th of December, the winter solstice when the pagans annually celebrate the birth of the sun."

St. Chrysostom, who lived in the last years of the fourth century (390), referring to the pagan festival of December 25th, says: "On this day also, the birth of Christ was lately fixed at Rome, in order that whilst the heathen were busy with their profane ceremonies the Christians might perform their holy rites undisturbed. All ecclesiastical historians know how St. Gregory and other hierophants of the third and fourth centuries, were instrumental in changing pagan festivals into Christian holidays, as they said: "for the express purpose of drawing the heathen to the religion of Christ." They always met pagans more than half-way, and in their well-meant catholicism, only succeeded in drifting themselvs into a semi-paganism, instead of alluring the heathen into Christianity. . . .

Well, Christmas has come and gone! The sun has passed the crisis! and poetically may be said to hav had a new birth. The days are getting longer and brighter, and soon the perfume of vernal flowers will float upon the winds. We hav had our Christmas trees, and evergreens, in defiance of the wrath of Father Tertullian, who, seventeen hundred years ago, denounced them as "gross idolatry"—but few of us hav thought of the mistletoe of the ancient Druids, or the foliage of laurel, myrtle, and ivy with which ancient pagans sought to entice their sylvan deities from the forests to their household firesides.

It is a significant fact that all the principal claims made by Jesus of Nazareth for himself, or by others for him, had been made for or by several other personages long before the time that he is said to hav lived in Palestine. Let us carefully examin this matter. One of the first points emphasized in connection with the advent of Jesus, is the claim that it was in exact fulfillment of ancient prophecy. Certain Christian writers claim that there are two hundred prophecies in the Old Testament relating to Jesus, while certain eminent German and English scholars deny that there is even one, which does not admit of a more rational application. The quotations from Old Testament prophecies in the gospels are, to say the least, unfortunate, and rather suggest the hypothesis that certain things, if done at all, were done to make the history fit the prediction. But if Jesus was the subject of prophecy, so were the Indian Christna and several other alleged divine incarnations, and their worshipers claimed that they were born in exact fulfillment of prophecy found in their ancient scriptures. It would require too much space to quote in extenso. The Vedas are full of prophecies relating to coming incarnations, and so are the Chinese sacred books. Even Zoroaster, who lived 570 B.C., prophesied: "A virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and a star shall appear blazing at midday to announce his appearance." "Where you behold the star," said he, "follow it whithersoever it leads you. Adore the mysterious child, offering him gifts with profound humility. He is, indeed, the almighty word which created the heavens. He is, indeed, your lord and everlasting king" (History of Idolatry, Faber, vol. 2, p. 92). It was believed that this prophecy was fulfilled by the advent of the Persian god Josa. It was common among the ancients to presage the birth of a god by the appearance of a mysterious star, and for astronomers to hasten to adore the new-born deity and present him gifts. Greece, Rome, Arabia, and even Mexico were all familiar with messianic prophecies. Bishop Hawes says that "the idea that God should in some extraordinary manner visit and dwell with men is found in a thousand forms among ancient heathen." The birth of Buddha, like the birth of Jesus, was announced in the heavens by an asterim on the horizon which is singularly called the "Messianic Star." When Christna was born his star was pointed out by Nared, a great astronomer.

The birth of every East Indian avatar was answered by celestial signs. Even the Jews hav similar traditions regarding Moses and Abraham. Canon Farrar admits in his "Life of Christ" that the Greeks and Romans always held this idea of the birth and death of great men being presaged by mysterious stars, and Tacitus affirms this regarding the dethronement of Nero. All candid theologians admit that this doctrin of the announcement of the birth of extraordinary persons by the appearance of stars was a universal belief among ancient peoples. Luke is the only evangelist that records the fact that the birth of Jesus was attended with the songs of angels from the heavenly world. And there is good reason for believing that this professed compiler drew his information from the apocryphal gospel called Protevangelion. But there is nothing novel in this idea, for the same thing had long been recorded of Christna at his birth—that "the quarters of the horizon were irradiate with joy." That "the spirits and nymphs of heaven danced and sang and at 'midnight' the clouds emitted low, pleasing sounds, and poured down rain of flowers." It is only necessary here to state that similar demonstrations are alleged to hav attended the advent of other Hindoo saviors, and also of Confucius, of Osiris, of Apollonius, of Apollo, of Hercules, and Escalapius. It is certainly very singular that all the circumstances connected with the birth of Jesus are recorded of several other persons long before. Christna was cradled among shepherds, to whom his birth was first announced, and the prophet Nared visited his father and mother and declared the child to hav been of divine descent. An aged hermit named Asita, like Simeon of the gospel, visited the infant Buddha and predicted wonderful things of his life and mission, and wept because he was too old to see the day. Not only was the infant Christna adored by the shepherds and magi, but he was presented with "gifts" of "sandalwood and perfumes," very like "frankincense and myrrh," and he was also presented with gifts of "costly jewels and precious substances," very like "gold." Substantially the same things are recorded of Mithras the Persian savior, of Socrates, and many of the Grecian and Roman demigods. It would require all our space and time to present in detail all the parallel incidents recorded of Christna and other avatars and the Jesus of our gospels. It must suffice to say, that these incidents are too numerous and circumstantial to be mere coincidences.

King Cansa was jealous of the infant Christna, and ordered a general slaughter of the infants, under a certain age, and in a certain district, just as Herod did when Jesus was born; and as Joseph and Mary were warned in a dream to flee into Egypt to save the young child's life, so the foster father of Christna was warned of danger by a "heavenly voice," and he was taken to Mathura, and Canon Farrar, speaking of the sojourn of Joseph, Mary, and the infant Jesus in Egypt, writes: "Ancient legends say that they remained two years absent from Palestine and lived at Matareeh a few miles northeast of Cairo." This seems to be the same legend, but the one regarding Christna is sculptured upon the rocks and temples of India, while contemporary history makes no mention of the slaughter of the innocents by Herod, and further embarrassment arises from the fact that Herod was not king at that time, as the taxing under Quirinus did not take place under the reign of Herod, he having been dead for six or seven years. It would be easy to present more than a score of instances in which persons who came to be regarded as demigods and heroes had been obliged to flee from the wrath of the reigning monarch at their birth, as it is also recorded of the infant Jesus. In all countries of olden times the reigning monarch has generally been jealous of some mysterious child, whose parents or care-takers were obliged to hide him away in some safe resort. The long fast and temptation of Jesus in the wilderness, found in the gospel "according" to Matthew, hav numerous parallels in the experience of other messiahs, even in minor details. The fast generally, as in the case of Moses, the Ninevites and Jesus, lasted forty days, but that of Buddha continued forty-seven days, and in his weakness and attenuation of body, he was tempted by Mara, the prince of evil, who promised him all the kingdoms of the earth, "universal empire," on certain conditions, but like Jesus he said, "Avaunt. Get thee away from me." After the temptation and triumph both Buddha and Jesus were ministered unto by visiting angels.

Zoroaster, the founder of the Persian religion, had a similar experience with the devil, of which there are many detailed reports. Both Christna and Jesus were precocious boys, disputing with doctors and astonishing their teachers with their learning, which had not been acquired in the usual way; and both wandered away from their parents, and became objects of anxiety and search to anxious mothers. Both preached a celebrated sermon, wrought numerous and very similar miracles, were hated and opposed by the priests of their day, and both suffered premature violent deaths, at about the same age, and then arose from the dead. These parallels might be given to an indefinit extent, as they appear in "Asiatic Researches," by Sir William Jones, Upham's "History and Doctrin of Buddhism," Hardy's "Manual of Buddhism," and numerous other ancient and modern writings on this subject, and the parallel facts presented by these authorities are admitted by the most distinguished Christian writers not a few It is admitted by the ablest theologians of the orthodox schools that miracles are indispensable to establish the claim of a special supernatural revelation, and great reliance is made upon the miracles credited to the Christian Christ, and yet we find other saviors and heroes credited not only with the same miracles, substantially, but with a larger number of even more wonderful miracles. It would be easy to fill a large volume of the alleged miracles of Buddha and Christna, and Prof. Max Müller affirms that the Buddhistic miracles "surpass in wonderfulness the miracles of all other religions." Zoroaster, Bochia, Osiris, Isis, and Horus all wrought miracles, even the raising of the dead. Serapis, Marduk, Bacchus, Esculapius, and Apollonius did the same, and the early Christian fathers admitted the reality of heathen miracles, but very conveniently attributed them to the devil. In short, it may safely be affirmed, that more wonderful and better authenticated accounts of miracles are given of numerous other persons, both before and after the Christian Christ, than are given of his miracles in the gospels. The Greeks were accustomed to say, "Miracles for fools," and the Romans shrewdly said, "The common people like to be deceived—deceived let them be," and even the Christian father, St. Chrysostom declared that "Miracles are proper only to excite sluggish and vulgar minds, men of sense hav no occasion for them." The modern theological idea of proving the record by the miracle, and the miracle by the record, has become too transparent for even the most credulous. The voluminous modern writer, Rev. Albert Barnes, admits in his "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity" that if there is any difference between the evidence of sorcery and witchcraft, and gospel miracles, it is in favor of the former.

In regard to the Jesus of Christianity, we know little or nothing. He is not mentioned by contemporaneous historians, for the first century of his alleged existence. Even his professed biographers giv no account of his life from twelve to thirty years of age. It is very doubtful whether such a man as Matthew ever lived. His is not a Jewish name, but Matthu was the name of the registrar of certain Egyptian annals. The books of Matthew and Mark were probably compiled by some persons now unknown, from the same documents, in the city of Alexandria. Matthew and Luke alone mention the supernatural birth of Jesus, and there is good reason for believing that the first three chapters of Matthew were interpolated in the second or third century for a purpose, while Luke does not claim to be anything but a compilation. But since all the incidents connected with the life of Jesus, are recorded of Christna and other Indian avatars, long before the alleged birth of Jesus, we naturally come to the conclusion, that his life (if he existed at all) was largely mythical. Certainly no such man as Jesus ever existed. I emphasize the word such. There were many men named Jesus. Josephus mentions eleven. The Jesus of Christmas is largely ideal, so that we hav been celebrating the life of a mythical savior, on the very day of the birth of the old sun-gods. Let us no longer worship doll babies, but relegate Santa-Claus and Cris-Cringle to the bats and the moles of superstition.

Who Dies in Misery?

From Fritankaren.

It is always the Christian who never has taken time and care to see to his mental house, whose belief is undermined. Look out, see that the foundation is really sound; and if not, build a new belief on a better foundation. Doubt always manifests itself in the depths of the human mind, but it seldom comes to the surface without being thoughtlessly suppressed. Man loves peace; he considers her, in the days of physical health, to be of greatest importance, and therefore he gets afraid when death comes. Then, on this occasion, it is that doubt darts forward and inquires into the great questions of truth; but, alas, there is not thought enough to answer these questions; the thoughts are too weak to fight out a battle which calls for both time and strength. The Christian dies with his doubts in darkness.

But the same is also the case with the Freethinkers whose free thoughts consist in that they do not think at all—individuals who pride themselvs on being Freethinkers, but who never troubled themselvs with such a thing as inquiry into the truth—Freethinkers who never hav doubted, never studied, never inquired, never fought a mental struggle, never answered a question—Freethinkers who never hav worked out for themselvs a real conviction. When the physical powers decrease and thoughts become feeble, then the old myths of hell and last judgment easily overpower their weak minds and call forth a fear of a something, a belief in which they never hav been entirely free from. A battle which they ought to hav fought long ago, dawns first now, hence even they die with their doubts in darkness.

Far otherwise it is with him who has a real, a sound conviction; he can die in peace. Doubt has its own intrinsic value, which never must be underrated, but in doubt must no one remain that wishes to die in peace. Man must liv out his doubts. It is not enough, during our whole life, to seek the truth; man must find her, must possess her. Man must be convinced that he holds the truth. Therefore nobody is invulnerable unless he has to his own full satisfaction answered the great questions.

VICTOR E. LENNSTRAND.

Mr. Burnham to Mr. Westbrook.

MR. R. B. WESTBROOK, D.D., LL.D., Dear Sir: On the first reading of your open letter to me I thought that I would not notice it. But on second reading thereof, the conviction was forced upon me that "the powers that be are ordained of God." I dare not refuse obedience to your official command. Allow me to say that your "flat denial" looks sickly and sad in the presence of the facts. "Ministers of the gospel were invited to do the work of the congress." These are my words. Had you known anything about the work of the National Liberal League, at its yearly sessions, and those that hav been held since the name was changed, you would know that the work of the congress was something more than tinkering and doctoring, although we at times had enough of this. The men and women invited to and billed for the congress did the work of the congress. This work in the main was the public addresses delivered on the rostrum. The work was one of education—instruction in the principles of Liberalism. The speakers did the work of the congress until the election of the officers for the ensuing year demanded attention, and then the congress elected them—not by a prearrangement which excluded the hard and tried workers of Liberalism, and selected inexperienced strangers to do the work; and thereby enabled the president to say to the world, in the most undemocratic terms sent out to the world, "I am surprised at finding myself in the presidential chair again with a secretary and treasurer of 'my own selection.'" This is certainly changing the method of former congresses.

You invited ministers to do this work, in violation of all former methods in our annual meetings, to the exclusion of men and women that had borne the heat and burden of the day, aside from Mr. Wakeman; and I think he must hav felt himself a stranger. It is true that several Liberals happened to be there—unbilled though they were—and the congress indeed would hav been a sorry concern if they had not been there. But the proof of my charges you still demand. Your entire method, from the first to the present, is in demonstration of the truth of that of which you complain. Your confession is, "my own choice," and the expression of that choice was in such a way as to ignore those that were there that were workers and had experience far longer in our cause. Hundreds of the Liberals of this country in silence look on while the blushes of shame cover their faces from deep humiliation on account of the attitude of the last congress. No beating around the bush, doctor. Let the facts speak for themselvs. Had the president seen fit to choose as workers veterans in the cause of Liberalism—such were at the congress—no doubt we would hav experience where we hav inexperience now. No. "My choice" was not for those that had such a record. Is it not true that you at the first were displeased with both our public speakers and our papers, and that the flag of our country should be above the cross, the emblem of superstition? Such a state of feeling readily accounts for the method which you hav chosen, which has placed the last congress in the position of which I complain. I charge you, sir, with no wrong intent, yet this does not justify your method. I find no fault with the clerical gentlemen which you invited instead of the able workers of past congresses. And I hav no fault to find with the "officers of my choice." They are not to blame for their inexperience in our work. I think, therefore, that the entire method which you hav chosen is in violation of the method of former congresses, and in almost every particular confirms the truth of my charge.

A Symposium on Liberalism.

A short time ago we said this to more than thirty Liberal writers: "There has been a great deal of talk at various times and by a good many of the leading Liberals about the Positiv or Constructiv side of Liberalism. It is stated that there is an Affirmativ as well as a Negativ philosophy connected with the Freethought movement; and that Liberals should build a religion or philosophy or system of morality, as well as destroy the system founded on superstition and supernaturalism.

"We want to obtain, therefore, for publication in The Truth Seeker the opinion of all the best-known writers for Liberalism on this subject. To do this we put the matter thus:

"Is there an Affirmativ, Positiv, Constructiv side to Freethought?

"If not, the reason why?

"If there be, in what, in your opinion, does it consist, and in what should it consist?"

In The Truth Seeker of February 8th we shall begin the publication of the replies. We hav received answers from

Saladin,
Editor of the London Agnostic Journal.

And hav been promised replies from Charles Watts, Editor of Secular Thought; G. W. Foote, Editor of the London Freethinker; J. E. Remsburg, John Peck, and others.

The synthesising of the Symposium will be performed by Thaddeus B. Wakeman, scientist, philosopher, and lawyer. His contribution will be a review of the others, with riders of his own, to appear in the issue following the completion of the publication of the replies.

We believe this expression of opinion on this subject will be one of the most valuable and interesting contributions ever made to the literature of Freethought, and may mark the beginning of a new era in the development of the mental world.

Every Liberal should read this symposium and circulate it around the neighborhood for the enlightenment of his neighbors.

The Pictures.

We hav received twenty-eight new subscribers during the past week on the picture account. This is a serious falling off from last week, but is not, we hope, an indication that Mr. Heston's friends hav slackened their efforts. The total to date of new subscribers is two hundred and nine, besides the donations, additions to which hav been received as follows within the past seven days:

Wm. Johnson	$1 00	Geo. Collins	1 00
W. P. Brooks, M.D.	1 00	A. Sloney	50
J. Cretors	2 75	Wm. M. Bunce	1 00
H. L. Warren	1 00	John McClemont	50
L. J. Tibbals	50	Susan Reichester	50
J. M. Jean	1 00	James McDonald	1 00
B. Sugenheimer	25

Making $125.40 in all. We wish that all our friends would speak a good word for the paper, if convenient, and hand a copy of it to some Liberal friend who may be a possible subscriber. To induce those to whom the paper may be given for this purpose to subscribe, we repeat the offer of "Try Square" as a premium, namely: Copies of the book to be given as premiums to, or for, new subscribers who pay the regular price of $3 for The Truth Seeker one year, before March 11th. One copy of the book to be given to every volunteer new subscriber, and one to every old subscriber who procures a new one at the regular price of $3. The price of the book by itself is $1.

By calling the attention of possible subscribers to the foregoing offer, perhaps their action may be hastened.

Chaplains in the Army.

It seems that Secretary of War Proctor must be added to the list of pietists in this administration who are endeavoring to make their official position abound to the glory of God and the Protestant church.

There are now thirty post chaplains in the army, authorized by the act of March 2, 1849, and four regimental chaplains, one for each of the colored regiments, authorized by the act of July 28, 1866. These thirty-four officers rank as captains of infantry with pay varying from $125 to $175 per month according to length of service. But there are over one hundred army posts in the country, and consequently some of them are without chaplains. In his first annual report Secretary Proctor says:

"There are at present one hundred and fourteen posts, so that a large number of soldiers are compelled to be without religious instruction. In view of the policy of the department to concentrate the troops in larger posts, this evil will rapidly diminish. It is to be regretted, however, that of the several duties devolving upon the government for the education and improvement of its soldiers this most essential element of all should be even temporarily neglected.

"It would be impossible at this time to say what changes, if any, will be permanently needed. In the present transitory state, therefore, I would only recommend that the department be empowered to provide for religious instruction at posts where there is no chaplain, by the temporary employment of clergymen, and that an appropriation be made for that purpose."

God and an appropriation! is the rallying cry for the churches, whose prophet is the secretary of war.

Where in the Constitution is laid upon the general government the duty of providing religion for the soldier or for anybody else? Let us hav the place pointed out, that no mistake may be made about this "most essential element."

For several years since the close of the war the churches hav been clamoring for a reorganization of the army chaplaincies, reorganization in this case meaning an increase of clerical leeches upon the already overdrained taxpayers. Under the shadow of the well-known holiness of this administration, the churches hav become emboldened to procure the introduction in Congress of several bills having for their object the advancement of religious interests. A sample one of these is described in a dispatch from Washington to a daily paper. It proposes a graded corps, to consist of twenty senior chaplains, thirty chaplains, and fifty assistant chaplains, having the pay and allowance respectivly of major, captain, and first lieutenant of infantry. To their names on the register would be added their religious denominations, which is not the practice now. The chaplains now on the activ list would be transferred to this corps, with their past service counting for the purposes of the act. Promotion would be by seniority, and for any original appointment to the lowest grade, that of assistant chaplain, the president would convene an examining board to be composed of the commander of the post needing a chaplain and four members of the corps of chaplains, who should be as far as practicable of the same religious denomination as the candidate, or of a denomination assimilating to it. Similar boards would be assembled for examination prior to promotion, and no appointment or promotion would be lawful except on the recommendation of the majority of such a board. A further provision on that measure is that every candidate for appointment as assistant chaplain must be under twenty-eight years of age, sound mentally and physically and well qualified for his duties. He would be eligible to the grade of chaplain after five years' service.

The enactment of such a law as this measure outlines would be a fine thing for the churches, and would be one of the next best things to the establishment of the Christian religion and the state support of preachers. Following it, every ship in the navy would be weighted with a "Holy Joe," and why should not every post-office and every custom house hav one too, and each internal revenue district? Why not throw the Constitution overboard, and say that as it does not please the churches it is of no value?

General Schofield, of the army, however, is not so sure that the proposed reorganization of the chaplaincies into military corps would meet with the approval of the army itself. According to him the army is not particularly anxious to be made religious. He writes to Senator Plumb of Kansas:

"Dear Senator: In reply to your indorsement upon the letter of Chaplain Nave, dated December 31st, I am not prepared to say what would be the best course to adopt for the much to be desired improvement in the moral and religious instruction and care of the army. This subject is beset with difficulties which do not exist in respect to any other branch of military administration. If the officers and men of the army belonged to any one religious denomination, whose principles and code of conduct were officially recognized and approved by the government, the subject would be greatly simplified. Under the conditions now existing a corps of chaplains belonging to many diverse denominations would be like a medical corps or an engineer corps composed of the adherents to as many diverse theories upon the science of medicin or engineering.

"In all other things the war department prescribes an exact code by which all in the army are to be instructed and governed, but in religion and morals the department must allow to all in the army the freedom guaranteed by the fundamental principles of our government to all who are under the dominion of its laws, exercising only such restraint in respect to moral conduct as is sanctioned by the common consent of the good people of the United States. There is therefore very little field for the performance of official religious services in the army, and great danger of doing more harm than good by any attempt to exercise military control or influence over religious matters.

"The American citizen, soldier no less than civilian, instinctivly rebels against any attempt to regulate his religious conduct by civil or military authority.

"After much and careful study of this subject my impression is that the best policy would be to leave the various garrisons in the army free to select religious ministers of their own choice, as other communities in this country do, the action of Congress to be limited to supplying the necessary money to pay for their services, and that of the war department to regulating the mode of their selection, etc. In this manner a large proportion of the troops, if not all, could hav the services of their own faith, at least a part of the time, which they do not now.

"Our system of army chaplains is an attempt to follow the custom of foreign countries, where one religion, and only one, is recognized and supported by the government—a system not at all applicable to our institutions. Our military legislation has never yet recognized the principles of religious liberty by providing the soldier at remote frontier stations with the religious services which he craves and needs. On the contrary, such remote garrisons are provided with a chaplain in whose religious opinions and mode of worship the great majority of the troops do not believe. Yet wonder is expressed that so little interest is manifested in religious services at the military posts. Giv the army religious liberty and assist the men to obtain the religious ministrations of which they feel the need, and there will be the same interest in religion in the army as elsewhere.

"But I am not committed to any theory, and will cordially favor and promote any means which may be thought best by which the moral and religious condition of the army may be improved."

If the general's suggestions are heeded, the soldiers would probably choose no chaplain. To be drawn up in line on Sunday and compelled to listen to a prosy preacher is just what, above all things, the soldier dislikes to do. He would much rather spend the time in quarters playing checkers. And to force him to listen to "divine services," as the preachers' efforts are called, is to rob him of his American manhood.

The only fair, as it is the only constitutional way, is to employ no chaplains, but let such soldiers as desire the labor of a preacher hire him and pay him as they do their bootblacks.

A Doctor of Divinity, the Lord, and Brazil.

A doctor of divinity of East Northfield, Mass., writes to the Independent concerning Brazil and its affairs. He thinks the republic has come to stay, because the foundations hav been solidifying through a century. The builders hav been heretical philosophers, scholars, men of affairs, and by their labors the republic "is now a pyramid standing on its base, not on its apex." Nevertheless, he says, "there are signs of impatience which put in jeopardy the exodus of the Republic. These are natural and may retard the march; but Brazil can no more go back than the Israelites could hav gone back into Egypt. Before she can thoroughly organize and possess the land of promis, she will hav to contend with factions who will lust after the onions and leeks of the old monarchy, and her leaders will hav need of the wisdom of Moses. Will they take it?" And then he givs an undecided world this wonderful paragraph:

"Just here is their peril. Many of them are Positivists. They are wiser than Moses; wise above what is written. Thus far there has been no recognition of God or his wonderful providence, which is, nevertheless, manifestly guiding or using them. If the pressure of great responsibilities drives them to him, they will be honored to complete the work they hav begun; if not the work will go on without them. Brazil is predestined by the ruler of nations to go forward under the principles of free government to a grand, a glorious future. Amen."

It seems rational to us, that if these Positivists hav got along so far without God they can go the rest of the way without him. To call him in now would make him one of those eleventh-hour fellows, who get around along toward quitting time, but want to draw a full day's pay, and would be derogatory to his reputation as an artisan.

But just see the self-debasement of the Christians in this paragraph. They will not allow that man does or can do anything. How does this doctor of divinity know that God has been guiding the Brazilian Positivists? How does he know that Brazil is predestined by God to go forward as a free country? The good sometimes die young. What he should hav said is that if the people of Brazil are sufficiently from under the domination of the priests, if they know how to govern themselvs, if they thoroughly believe in a government of, for, and by the people, if they believe that the right of government comes from the consent of the governed and not from God, if they are willing to do the best they can—profit by experience and correct mistakes—if they are ready to work for their own welfare and their own material progress on the human and not on the superhuman plane, if they possess the spirit of liberty, and are willing to grant to others all the rights they claim for themselvs—if they believe and can do all these, then there is no doubt that Brazil will go forward under the principles of free government to a grand, a glorious future.

But there is no God needed, and it is not possible for him to do anything at all in the matter.

The Protestants and the Catholics.

Cardinal Gibbons went down to Charleston, S. C., last week to lay the cornerstone of a new cathedral in that city. He was taken on an excursion around the harbor, and given also a public reception. At the dedication services several Protestant clergymen and a Jewish rabbi occupied seats on the platform beside the cardinal and the other priests who conducted the services.

The Rev. Mr. Thompson, of a Presbyterian church of the city, did not like this, and has published a letter condemning the conduct of his fellow-Protestants. He says:

"The presence of these Protestants was doubtless intended only as a courtesy, but it was more—it was a virtual indorsement of those proceedings, and a godspeed to the gigantic ecclesiastical organization that conducted them. It is the boast of that church that it is the only church of God. The cardinal said as much yesterday. It brands all others as heretics. A former bishop of Charleston declared, 'Within thirty years the Protestant heresy will come to an end.' It claims for itself temporal and spiritual supremacy. It tolerates those who differ from it only where it has not the power to enforce its claims. Its spirit has undergone no change since those days when it gave its order for and sang its Te Deum over the wholesale, indiscriminate slaughter of helpless Protestants.

"Its fundamental principles are antagonistic to our government and its most cherished institutions. Its growth in this country menaces some of our dearest rights and privileges. Notes of warning hav come to us from many of the foremost statesmen and thinkers as to what we may expect should it ever gain the ascendency, and yet we hav the spectacle of Protestant preachers and laymen, some of them the descendants of Huguenots, glorifying a Romish cardinal and encouraging the extension of the spiritual despotism he represents. Had the circumstances been reversed, Romanists would hav been conspicuous by their absence.

"I contend that Protestants are sacrificing their history and are putting contempt upon their martyr dead and are stultifying their former testimony and are sweeping the ground from under their feet as to mission work in Romish lands and are imperiling the future of their country by thus favoring Romish pretension and progress."

Mr. Thompson writes at a white heat, and his brethren are much exercised over his words. With their usual craftiness the Catholics say nothing, but watch with interest the war which they hope will more widely separate the "heretics," as they call the Protestants.

Nevertheless, Mr. Thompson is right. The miscegenation which a few misguided Protestants are laboring to bring about between Romanism and Protestantism will be, if accomplished, productiv of but one thing—the absorption of the Protestant conservativs. The lamb may lie down with the lion, but the lamb will be under cover and invisible. A year or two ago many orthodox Protestants took sides with the Roman Catholics on the school question. The Sabbath Union has made much of Cardinal Gibbons's letter approving its Sunday law petition. The Baltimore lay council of Catholics adopted a resolution in which occur these significant words: "There are many Christian issues in which Catholics could come together with non-Catholics and shape civil legislation for the public weal." There is no doubt, then, that many of the fanatical Protestants would like to see a unification of the two sects, but they should ponder well over Mr. Thompson's warning ere they take the indissoluble vow. Rome never gets left in a bargain. For years the two sects hav united in this state to plunder the taxpayers, but the Roman Catholics hav always borne off the lion's share of the booty, and but a few months ago they nearly succeeded in an attempt to capture a Protestant church built on one corner of a block of land, the remainder of the block being occupied by a Romish institution, which desired it all. The two sects had stolen the block jointly, and it was a fight for the spoils, the Protestants winning only by paying for the land. It was a clear case of rogues falling out and honest men—the taxpayers—getting their dues. The papists can yet giv the Calvinists lessons in larceny.

And as it was in the matter of this church so will it be in any alliance between the two sects. Rome has more experience in intrigue, and is shrewder and more unscrupulous than her imitator. She is cozening the Protestants now to win respectability; she knows the American people hav always looked at her askance, as a suspicious character, and she desires first of all social recognition, then equality, and alliance; winning that through the greed of some Protestants, the complaisance of others, the indifference of the masses—then look out for her!

It givs us pleasure to record that the missionary spirit is spreading. One of North Dakota's prominent men, aided by his friends, has sent a copy of Remsburg's "Sabbath Breaking" to each law-maker of North Dakota, one hundred and sixteen in all. He did it, he said, to educate the legislators, and to help influence their action on the Sunday-law penalty bills now before them for action. It would be a good thing for Liberalism if a man like him could be found in every state of the Union.

MR. GUSTAVE NELSON, our correspondent for Forestport, N. Y., has, through the Utica papers, challenged the clergymen of the vicinity to discuss the fundamental basis of the Christian religion from a historical and philosophical standpoint. To date, Mr. Nelson is disappointed in obtaining an opponent.

AN article may be very good, but if sent to us unaccompanied by name and address of writer, it will not be used. Correspondents may remain unknown to the public if they desire, though even that seems unnecessary, but not to the Editor.

NORTH DAKOTA has already enacted a Sunday law. We hav not seen its provisions, but the penalty for violating it is a fine of one dollar. Since its enactment the Christians hav introduced two bills increasing the penalty. Our information is that the new bills are not likely to pass the House.

THE Milwaukee preachers declare that Sunday papers are iniquitous, and will eventually call down upon the publishers the vengeance of God. We fancy, though, that if the publishers are not punished till the Lord does it their immunity will be of long duration. It isn't God, but the fanatics, that make the trouble.

WE print this week a portion of Colonel Ingersoll's address before the New York State Bar Association, at Albany, January 20th. Advance proof-sheets hav been kindly furnished us for this purpose by C. P. Farrell, Colonel Ingersoll's publisher, who will print the full address in an elegant pamphlet, retailing for 10 cents. Orders may be addressed to this office. The address is crammed full of common sense, humanity, love of justice, kindness. Men will be made better by reading it; every warden and keeper in every prison ought to read it; and lawmakers should take it seriously to heart.

THE Christian Statesman says of Colonel Ingersoll's article on "God in the Constitution:" "The bold Atheism which it inculcates, and on which the writer rests his opposition to religious acknowledgment in political constitutions, will create a powerful revulsion of feeling in favor of the National Reform movement. Under his logic, all American citizens who believe in God, in a providence which rules the nations, and a moral government which holds them responsible to the moral law, must be in favor of the acknowledgment of God in the fundamental law of the nation. If for no other reason it is needed in order to assure the world that Mr. Ingersoll's theory is not the theory of the American people." The reasoning ability of the Christians is remarkable!

THE New York Presbytery spent last week in discussing the proposed revision of the Confession of Faith. They split non-existent theological hairs as vehemently as though they were discussing facts. In commenting upon the sections dealing with predestination one of the revision advocates exclaimed: "You are congenitally damned. You were damned before you were born. God hated us while we were in our mother's womb. That is preterition." And he added: "If I felt obliged to preach that doctrin I would tear my Geneva gown into shreds and rip my bands into rags before the coming Sabbath, and my elders and my deacons and all my membership would stand by me." If predestination means that sort of preterition, predestination ought to go. And while it is going, it might as well take the rest of the Confession with it.

IN accepting the nomination for national Senator from the Democratic caucus of the Ohio legislature, Calvin S. Brice said: "I know and acknowledge my inability to fill that high office to my own satisfaction. My ideal of it was formed in the exciting period of politics between 1854 and 1864, when my mind took up those political questions. I think I hav a high ideal within me, as any of my friends and associates in northwestern Ohio know. And I hope, gentlemen, that I can in some measure carry out that ideal which I then formed of free thought, free speech, and free action, as much of each as is consistent with giving the same amount to everyone else in the commonwealth. This is the sum of my democracy: No more legislation than is necessary to accomplish this purpose. By this principle I try every question presented to me, and whether the issue be a temporary one, or whether it be a protracted one, by it I know I can test the place where I can stand, and where, it seems to me, the Democracy ought to be." We hope Mr. Brice will not conceal these sentiments when on the floor of the Senate.

THE National Secular Society of England has voted $12 to help provide food for Victor Lennstrand, the Swedish Freethought martyr, and decided to appeal to the Freethinkers of Great Britain for further assistance for their Swedish brethren. Mr. Lennstrand, as Capt. Ótto Thomson has informed THE TRUTH SEEKER'S readers, is serving two terms of three months' imprisonment and one of six, and, as other sentences are pending, it is possible that he will be doomed to linger for two years in the place which Swedish Christianity reserves for bold and honest skeptics. Fortunately Mr. Lennstrand is in good spirits. He is provided with writing materials, and is contributing to his journal, the Fritänkaren (Freethinker). Captain Otto Thomson has left his home and gone to Stockholm for the purpose of conducting the paper during his friend's imprisonment, and he will keep the flag flying or fall beneath it. The darker side of the matter is this, says the London Freethinker: The Swedish Freethinkers are poor and they are overwhelmed by the difficulty of maintaining the paper, which does not yet pay its way, and providing Mr. Lennstrand with decent food during his incarceration. Of course it scarcely need be said that prison fare in Sweden is very hard and might seriously injure a delicate-bred gentleman. A Swedish prisoners' fund is therefore open and subscriptions are urgently requested. They can be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter street, E.C., London, Eng. American Freethinkers who desire also to aid can send by international post-office order to the same address.

AMBOY, ILL., Jan. 17, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 as a donation for continuation of pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am not able to get any new subscribers, but would be willing to pay $1 per year extra rather than see the pictures discontinued. I must hav them, and the monkey too. C. RANDALL.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find four subscribers. Also send me the ANNUAL and the books named. We all vote for a continuation of the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I wish I could send you more subscribers, but we are few at present in this part of the world. But we hope to grow.

MR. EDITOR: I am trying to do my utmost to help our cause along. I believe I succeed in doing so by getting you a new subscriber every year. One paper is to go to my old address and the other to Rodney, with the ANNUAL inclosed. Hoping all Liberals will do their best, I remain,

EMILE GNEDON.

PORT HURON, MICH., Jan. 13, 1889.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2—$1.50 to renew for six months, and fifty cents for two ANNUALS for 1890. I hav not been able to get a subscriber yet, but will say, Keep the pictures going. I cannot feel very tender-footed when I read how the churches hav dealt with the feelings of Freethinkers, and what they please to call Infidels.
T. BALKWELL.

SPRINGFIELD, WIS., Jan. 16, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is seventy-five cents for which send me the ANNUAL for 1890; the balance please use toward defraying the expense of the cartoons. I hav been trying to get a new subscriber, but hav failed so far. I hav a splendid scrap-book of Heston's cartoons, nicely arranged to entertain my clerical friends with. C. K. PHELPS.

BOZEMAN, MONT., Jan. 3, 290.
MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for the ANNUAL and the herein-named pamphlets. I am in favor of the pictures. I hope you will be able to continue them. If I cannot make sure of a subscriber by the time I renew my subscription, I will try to raise at least $1 for the continuance of the cartoons. G. W. DRAKE.

VIENNA, N. Y., Jan. 7, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1; you may send me two ANNUALS, and keep the fifty cents for the pictures.
Yours, C. S. TREMAIN.

TERRELL, TEX., Jan. 6, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: You will herein find fifty cents, for which please send me "For Her Daily Bread," and "Blasphemy," Colonel Ingersoll's Defense of Mr. Reynolds. Many wishes for the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and continuance of the pictures. Respectfully, T. C. GLASS.

NAPLES, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: After a three months' trial, I find THE TRUTH SEEKER to be satisfactory, and I do not calculate to hav my name canceled. As to the pictures, I assure you that you cannot occupy the space to better advantage. They certainly attract more than they repel. Find inclosed $5 for my subscription and one new subscriber. M. M. WILEY.

STRASBURG, ILL., Jan. 3, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for about eight years. I do not know that I like the last number any better than the first. It is like riding on a good railroad that makes thirty-five or forty miles an hour. It is going in my direction, and will get there. I will vote for the pictures, and inclose $3 for one dozen ANNUALS for 1890. A. YORK

HUNTINGDON, P. Q., Jan. 6, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader now for one year of your very interesting and instructiv paper, and am much pleased with the pictures of Mr. Heston's. It is impossible to obtain any subscribers in this goodly land. You might just as well try to get the devil to bathe in holy water. Long may you liv to spread the truth through the columns of the good old TRUTH SEEKER. GEO. CALDWELL.

DELAVAN, MINN., Jan. 16, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10—$5 for two years' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for the following books: Paine's complete works, "Looking Backward," TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890, and others on inclosed list. While the vote is being taken on the cartoons I want to cast my vote in favor of continuing them, and hope you will get all the support needed. Yours truly, JAMES GEDDES.

GRANT FORK, ILL., Jan. 5, 290.
MR. EDITOR: I hav held my peace concerning the cartoons in your paper, hoping I might get a subscriber, but hav thus far failed. My opinion concurs with that of the majority of your patrons, i.e., that the pictures are a great help in propagandism, especially among the children. And as the other literature is above and beyond the appreciation of the orthodox, you can lose nothing from the pictures, if they are abhorrent to their reverential minds.
EX-REV. J. N. MAXEY.

WHITE BLUFF, TENN., Jan. 10, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find my subscription. And right here I want to say, giv me the pictures. If you cannot hav the papers with the pictures please giv me the pictures in a separate package, for they are the best thing in the United States to convince the Christian of the error of his ways. I could write all day in favor of Heston's illustrations, but I cannot see why it should be necessary to say anything. They speak for themselvs to a person of good taste. S. P. JONES.

ROCKFORD, Jan. 4, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money for subscription, the ANNUAL, and books named. About the pictures—I hav never liked them. I would not pay a cent to keep them. I hav never felt like finding fault if the majority want them. I do not need them to convince me of all the nonsense there is in the Bible. But if others do, I can bear with them. I hav sometimes felt that it might prevent some from taking the paper that otherwise would. Perhaps I am mistaken. I hope so. MRS. S. B. MILLER.

BLACK CREEK, O., Jan. 6, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is a welcome visitor at our house. I do not know how we could do without it. "God in the Constitution," by Col. R. G. Ingersoll, should be read by every school boy and girl in the United States, and "Secularization of the Church," by Robert C. Adams, is too good to be missed. We want to hear from John Peck as often as possible. Heston, keep up the pictures. There is a volume in them. Some people understand better by pictures than by reading. ELLEN THOMAS.

OSAWKEE, KAN., Jan. 7, 290.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find seventy-five cents—twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1890, and fifty cents to help continue Heston's pictures. I should like to make it $50, but I am over seventy years old and I think I am dying. I hav taken your paper for seven or eight years, and always paid in advance, and seem to like it better with every number. It is my intention after getting my body cremated and paying all expenses, to send you something to help continue Friend Heston's cartoons. D. S. JONES.

VISCHER'S FERRY, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. About the pictures, I like them first-rate. I think that jawbone picture is worth vastly more than all the $50 hell-fire sermons that hav ever been preached. But as for getting a new subscriber, you might as well ask me to climb up to the moon. If I ask anyone to just read my paper, he thinks I am trying to lead him to the devil. The Christians think THE TRUTH SEEKER emanated from the father of lies (but what he ever lied about they do not know).
A. BEST.

BERRYVILLE, ILL., Jan. 5, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: I say, Go on, Mr. Heston, and do not stop until you illustrate the whole Bible. As my wife is a Christian, we frequently hav ministers stop with us. I hand them THE TRUTH SEEKER. They look at the illustrations, and it is a splendid way to draw them into a discussion. We cannot do without the pictures. My whole family, and neighbors, are interested in them. I will try to get a new subscriber. D. M. GADDEY.

RANDOLPH, N. Y., Dec. 30, 1889.
MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3.25 to pay for another year's passage and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890. You ask each subscriber's opinion of the propriety of continuing the illustrations, and also intimate that there must be forthcoming new subscribers or the extra expense of the illustrations can not be borne. Well, I for one should regret very much to hav them discontinued, but I find it next to impossible to get new subscribers. Be assured I wish the paper abundant subscribers to insure the continuation of the illustrations. Heston is a mascot to the paper. JOHN HAMMOND.

SILVERTON, COL., Jan. 4, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: I am going to get you a new subscriber soon. I sent you a new one when I renewed my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, about a month since, but we are all anxious to hav the pictures continue, so I will try to get another. I wish to ask sister Lettie Foster, of Custer City, Pa., if she keeps the illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER hid from her children, what does she do with her Bible? I would like to ask the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER if there is any verse in the Bible that could not be transferred to a postal card and sent through the mails without being considered unlawful. MRS. P. FISHER.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 10, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: I see many of your readers are expressing themselvs in regard to Mr. Heston's pictures in your paper. Allow me to add my indorsement of them. I believe they do more good than any lengthy article written by the best writer in the land. Heston I think the best part of your paper, to start people to thinking for themselvs. Many that would discard an article on Freethought hav looked upon one of his pictures and found in them enough to start their minds in the right direction. Keep them in your paper, by all means. Yours, etc., J. W. BUTTERFIELD.

STAPLES, MINN., Jan. 10, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: "Money is what talks." Let $1 of the amount inclosed "talk for" the pictures; for the remainder send the ANNUAL for 1890. "Get a new artist" indeed! I presume Mr. Crow would get one who would picture Samson in nineteenth-century clothes—picture him stealing honey from the bees without retaliation on their part. I know a man who considers the pictures "vile" and said the paper ought to be suppressed. This man was unfortunate in his youth. He suffered a stroke of orthodox influenc-a that resulted in intellectual suppression—a species of mental la grippe. D. C. JENKINS.

NEWMANSTOWN, PA., Jan. 13, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890. In reading my first number of your paper I came to the following conclusion: If all my neighbors and friends could be induced to read literature of the kind published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, how soon would ignorance and superstition vanish! I would also state that, as much as I hav seen of the pictures, I must say I do like them, for they are the very object-teachers we must hav to remind those believers without seeing. I know by experience that the most successful teaching is that through objects, as it will leave a lasting mental image.
WILL B. IBACH.

GARNETT, KAN., Jan. 7, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50 for continuation of the Liberal's Bible, the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. I think that doing without the pictures now would be a great deal like doing without "salt on our tater." It might go down perhaps without, but it goes down a great deal better with the pictures. I look upon them as just the thing to represent in their true and proper light the Munchausen stories contained in the Bible. They never were a truth, and are not a truth now; and why treat with solemnity an absurdity which is only fit to be laughed at by sensible people? As soon as I can I will respond in such a way as to more fully express my preference for the pictures. CHARLES GREGG.

DIXIE, TEX., Jan. 1, 1890.
MR. EDITOR: The great question at issue seems to be the continuance or discontinuance of the pictures. I shall giv my word as well as an old subscriber. As to myself, I consider them a necessity. Their execution would not stand a World's Exhibition at Paris or anywhere, but it is their meaning or expression that I consider useful, and in some few instances even attractiv. I know also that whenever I see my friends at Brackettsville, it is the pictures which are overhauled before we enjoy ourselvs otherwise.

Is there anything more imposing and important to a citizen of the United States than the expression in the picture of No. 1, Vol. XVII, Jan. 4, 1890, "What Uncle Sam should do?" If he does not do it the consequences will be fearful, and may terminate in a destruction of our great republic whose only enemy worth while considering is the priest of any denomination. ALBERT TURPE.

NARROWS, FLA., Jan. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see my time is up to-day, and knowing that it takes money to run a business successfully, I inclose my check for a "V" to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER. By all means keep up the illustrations, if for no other purpose than to reach the rising generation. Pictures and children hav an affinity and it is the children we want to educate and start aright. All else will follow in due time. I want to see THE TRUTH SEEKER a success financially, and I hav often thought, Why not devote more space to commercial advertisments and derive an income from that source? Church periodicals do it more or less. Why not THE TRUTH SEEKER?

L. B. DAWSON.

PAXTON, ILL., Jan. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see that some of our friends are not in favor of Mr. Heston's pictures. But I, for one, am in favor of the pictures. I think they are just the thing to hav in the paper. Our friend makes the proposition of having an extra sheet to the paper, and having that illustrated. It would be very well. And let those that wanted the pictures pay extra for them, and those that do not want them pay for the paper only. I, for one, am in favor of that way. And, oh! how well I would like to hav an illustrated Bible by Mr. Heston. If he will illustrate one and hav it published, I will take a copy and do all I can to sell copies for him, for I think it would be grand. If Mr. Heston makes the Bible, I will hav one if it costs me $100. A. G. NEWKIRK.

SMITHVILLE FLATS, N. Y., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, all for yourself and the pictures. I see nothing objectionable in them, as they generally represent both sides of the subject. Suppose our civil courts closed up business after one side of the evidence is given, and the judge, or jury, or justice should bring in the decision. I insist that we know nothing of our own side until we are acquainted with the opposit. It is a beautiful religion that cannot see itself in picture. It is also a beautiful spirit that wishes to crush out the sciences and institute bigotry instead. "The tree is known by its fruit." We shall tell them all by the vote they cast in the coming contests now, or soon to come, before the people. I also inclose stamps to pay for the ANNUAL. MABEL M. TARBELL.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3.25 for subscription and the ANNUAL. As for the pictures—they are admired very much by the family, and so often draw forth the exclamation from some one, "Oh! the genius of that Heston!" If I am allowed to cast a vote, I should say, continue them if possible. But I would suggest that the last-page picture be made to look more genteel, not so cheap-looking—the people not so out of proportion, and not with such hideous features. I think so much of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I wish all who giv it a glance to be favorably impressed with it. The subjects that those pictures are made to show up are so absurd and ridiculous, they will look bad enough when made to look their best. MRS. F. I. BIRD.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., Jan. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for two subscriptions. We hav been occasional readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but we intend to cast our votes on the cartoon question. We are decidedly in favor of their continuation, and you may put us down as two more of the five hundred. Some good Christians might feel offended at Heston's conception of Jehovah and Moses and his kinsfolks, but I seriously question whether Elijah would hav dealt as leniently with the gods of the prophets of Baal as THE TRUTH SEEKER art st has with that old bald-headed myth, Jehovah. When I handed some of your papers to friends for perusal they invariably studied over both of the cartoons and searched among the inside pages for more. I could persuade but very few to read the pamphlets, but the pictures always absorbed interest, which was very often transferred to the articles in the paper.

Respectfully yours, OTTO PRAEGER.

OGDEN, UTAH, Jan. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $4 for subscription and books. Now I want to say something about the cartoons, but fear I cannot do them justice. I am satisfied they are a power in support of the principles THE TRUTH SEEKER desires to sustain. They reproduce the wonders of the Bible in their true significance—that is, that they are legends of the long past based in ignorance and superstition, and sustained by tradition, and finally selected by Bible compilers and crafty priests to sustain their Bible God idea, and keep the people in ignorance. What really is the object of those pictures? Are they to make light of holy things, divine performances, set forth to represent Jehovah as the God of the universe? Are they to mock and ridicule sacred things? No. These pictures are calculated to produce the opposit effect. They teach lessons of intelligence and wisdom; they arrest the progress of such blasphemous and absurd representations of an all-powerful and all-mighty intelligence, as the Christian clergy would hav us accept of their God and his works. Now, I am in for the pictures. The paper will lose much by their absence. I think if they were put in book form, with or without writing or explanation, they would sell. Everyone in favor of them would take a copy. Some would take more. I will hav a half dozen, and the book-stands would sell them fast. JOHN A. JOST.

LAKE CITY, IA., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed pay for your ANNUAL. I say, yes, by all means let us hav the pictures. And since it is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, let us hav both sides, for many times the mind is more vividly impressed by the ridiculous than in any other way. I will send an extra dollar for Mr. Heston. I am extremely sorry you hav a few readers so refined they cannot bear the light. I expect it is the naked truth they cannot bear. Poor things, they ought to unite with Tony Comstock and suppress anything so nude. I feel almost sorry for one lady and one gentleman whose refined sensibilities are so shocked by Heston's "horrid pictures." I think them entirely too-too for this world; they had better climb a tree. But since they acknowledge it is only a very few—the most refined, of course—that would notice the bad work, why should they make such loud complaint? How you are to get a nice, refined picture from a nasty, lying subject, is more than I can comprehend. I expect that Mr. Heston has not received one-fourth of what he ought to hav had for his work. I hav given once or twice to the picture fund, and should hav done much more. But I will not find fault in order to settle the bill. I know nearer home Mr. Heston is thought to hav an uncommonly fertil brain and fine artistic taste.

J. L. TOMPKINS.

CERYL, NEB., Jan. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. I do not agree with Mr. James Parton's opinion in regard to the pictures. If THE TRUTH SEEKER is to be shorn of everything that repels, or is distasteful to, Christians, it might as well be turned into a Christian Advocate at once. It makes no difference how repugnant they may be to a certain class. They go right to the point at once, and tell the truth before a person can help it. The cartoons are so many periodical lessons that are forced upon every Bible-believer that picks up the paper. I hav never had a person object to becoming a subscriber on this account. The absurdity of reverencing such tales as Heston portrays—sometimes with the sharpest ridicule—becomes apparent at once. Some Christians hav to be shocked to set them to thinking. It is surprising how ignorant many Bible-believers are in regard to the contents of that ancient volume, and how quick they may be made to lose their reverence. I hav the promis of one or two new subscribers, and if one of them is not forthcoming soon I will contribute $1 to continue Mr. Heston's work on THE TRUTH SEEKER. The pictures are efficient in exposing the absurd stories of the Holy Queer. They are sure to start a discussion when exposed to view in a crowd.

I hav always been an admirer of Mr. Burnham, and was sorry to see his harsh criticism on the congress proceedings and its officers. I know of many nominal Christians that are in favor of the total separation of church and state, church taxation, and opposed to the Bible in the public schools, and I believe if these questions are ever brought out they will be with us—to say nothing of Spiritualists, Jews, and Adventists.

Hoping the picture agitation will stimulate your patrons to greater efforts to increase your circulation, I remain,

Yours, HENRY J. OLMSTEAD.

ERIS, O., Jan. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am the only outspoken Freethinker in this neighborhood. I do not aim to be a fanatic, but when they attack me I giv them my ideas. I circulate all my papers, and am making many skeptics. I hav some books, and as soon as I get through with them I circulate them. If I was able I would build a hall in our little town. There are some in the neighborhood that say they will help presently.

What about the pictures? There are five of us in the family—three children going to school. It is not natural for children to read papers, you know, but when they see those pictures they want to know what they mean. Then it is explained to them that they are to represent the way they used to do in heathen times when they were ignorant of science. My little folks dote on them. I hav often thought how I would love to hav had the advantage of Freethought literature when I was young. I would not teach Freethought to my children if I thought it was wrong. If they grow up in this belief it is worth more to them than anything else I can do for them. As for my part, I like the pictures very much. My wife always takes great pride in showing them to Christians when she gets a chance. You see there is no chance for a quarrel about our religion in the family. So you see we count one for the pictures. We will send you some money to help pay the cost of the pictures.

About twelve years ago a good man here went insane on religion. He went to his nearest neighbor and almost used him up. He claimed he was Christ. He cut himself in his craze. On his deathbed, when he was rational, he claimed the cause was Bible-reading. I helped to take him. He said when he approached me and two other men after night that he would kill every devil of us. That was about the time I began reading Freethought. You know that was a pretty good case to begin with. G. W. PEIRCE.

KNIGHT'S FERRY, CAL., Jan. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I received your sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 30th, and send you $5. I already take so many Liberal papers—more than I can read—that I send you the $5 to be credited to your extension fund. You can send two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER anywhere you think they will do the most good. Your sample copy illustrates the infamous doctrin of predestination, and alone is worth a year's subscription of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I sincerely hope the continued prosperity of your valuable paper. You may like to read the appended account of the doings of your Liberal friends:

The Press and Knickerbocker some time since announced that Mr. Abraham Schell, of this city, whose residence is at Knight's Ferry, Cal., would celebrate his golden wedding there on December 5th. We see now by the Modesto News that the event took place, and that paper devotes nearly a column to it. There were about eighty guests present. The interior of the handsome home was made unusually attractiv by the elegant and tasteful decorations. On entering the parlor, visitors were met with a handsome floral piece, arranged to form the figures "1839–1889," skilfully executed with evergreens and white and gold chrysanthemums.

The grounds are always inviting and attractiv, but they were rendered doubly so at night by the illuminations from vari-colored lanterns. The banquet was a sumptuous one. There was music of several kinds. The Knight's Ferry band rendered some exceptionally fine airs. A noticeable and praiseworthy feature was a cornet solo by the leader, who was accompanied on the piano by Miss Nellie Church. Mr. Schell, also, delighted those present by a splendid solo on the flute, accompanied on the piano by Miss Church. The entire affair was rendered all the more enjoyable by the absence of ceremony, general sociability and enjoyment being the order of the day.

The Press and Knickerbocker heartily congratulates Mr. and Mrs. Schell upon their long association in wedded bliss, and also on the consummation of this happy event.

ABRAHAM SCHELL.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., Jan. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You ask for expressions from subscribers whether Mr. Heston's pictures shall or shall not be continued in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would answer by first asking, What is the principal object of THE TRUTH SEEKER? Is it to convert Mr. Parton, myself, and hundreds of other old-time Freethinkers to a belief in the principles so ably advocated therein—to redeem those who need not redemption, the "ninety-nine who are already safe within the fold?" Or is it to rescue the one, or many, "lost sheep" who know not the truth, that is taught in these pictures far better than by page upon page of good, sound reading-matter—never read by them? For if you do not know, I do, that it is almost impossible to get the most liberal-minded amongst them to read anything that is not in accord with their religious belief. But a picture is quite another affair. Who amongst us will not look at a caricature, whether for or against us? Does not the popularity of Puck, Judge, Life, etc., rest almost entirely on the caricatures contained therein? And was not the most formidable weapon used to the destruction of the Tweed ring of your city a few years ago the admirable caricatures of Nast? Among the common, every-day people there is nothing which strikes with more force and effect in politics than the caricatures indulged in so freely during our political campaigns. Such being the case in politics, why should it not hold equally true in religion, Mr. Parton to the contrary notwithstanding? I will leave it to any live subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER if, when at the post-office; on his way home; in the shop, factory; upon the street, or wherever he may be, he shows these pictures, they will not create an impression, which may at first be unfavorable, but the everlasting curiosity of this Yankee nation gets the upper hand and the final result will be a desire to see what the "durned fools hav to picture, anyhow," till eventually something drops onto the curiosity-seeker's mind too heavy to get away from and he begins to cogitate the picture in his mind, when, if his common sense is allowed the least show in the world, you obtain another subscriber to the old TRUTH SEEKER, probably without his reading one continuous page of its contents. Inclosed find price of the ANNUAL, which please send me, and whenever called upon by the adoption of the cover, that additional fifty cents shall be forthcoming. D. D. LAKE.

DETROIT, MICH., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: If criticisms of Watson Heston's cartoons as they appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER are in order, allow me to say I think them grand and more instructiv and convincing to the ignorant Christian fanatic, when taken in connection with the verbatim quotations from the so-called word of God, than all the written or editorial arguments and reasoning which could be brought to bear on their priest-ridden and benighted intellects. Voltaire, Volney, Paine, and hosts of other great and learned men, hav tried the force of good sound sense, argument, and reason, adducing proof upon proof to any intelligent mind of the many inconsistent, false, and ridiculous statements contained in the Jew's and Christian's holy Bible, and of the folly of its claims of divine origin and authorship. And still millions of human beings, who are otherwise fairly intelligent, are misguided and deluded into a belief in the divine authenticity of the writings contained in that old book of fable, mythology, history, debauchery, and crime, and are to-day wallowing in the mire and slime of superstition and ignorance at the feet of their meek and lowly Jesus, singing:

Oh, to be nothing, nothing,
Only to lie at his feet!

Robert G. Ingersoll, being a powerful orator and fluent writer, recognizes the superior power of ridicule over argument in battling with the soldiers of the cross. This is the reason why he is the modern Samson in slaying the Christian Philistines in debate and lecture. While his weapon is not the jawbone of an ass, still it is a jaw which, when engaged in hurling ridicule into the ranks of the enemy, makes a slaughter in the Christian ranks even greater than that recorded slaughter the ancient Samson made on the Philistines.

Heston is using the same weapon, ridicule, as applied in picture literature, and is doing a noble work. Therefore let the good work continue, until the great multitude of Christian devotees shall commence to investigate the dogmas of the Christian religion. For the moment they commence a thorough investigation, they commence to say good-bye to the yoke of the crafty, greedy, rapacious, heartless, hypocritical, inhuman sharks whom they hav served so long and who hav lorded it over them under the name of popes, priests, pastors, and preachers. I also will giv $100 for one copy of King James's version of the Bible illustrated with Heston's cartoons, as specified by L. E. Allen in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 4th. W. D. SMITH.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Making Believe.

Do you ever play at making believe?
'Tis the merriest play I know,
With the power a magic spell to weave
However the wind may blow.

If you've only a simple cotton gown,
A little the worse for wear,
Just make believe that in all the town
There isn't a dress so fair.

Instead of faded and scanty folds,
You may fancy it rustling silk,
A warp that luster of moonlight holds,
And a woof that is white as milk.

You may "make believe" with a bit of bread
And a cup of water poured,
That you sit with ease at a royal spread,
No lack at the festal board.

The people who "make believe" aright
Shorten the longest day;
Brighten the gloomiest hours with light,
And laugh their trouble away.

It's always foolish to sigh and shirk;
If anything must be done,
With an earnest purpose turn the work
To "make believe" of fun.

And if only you try this "make believe,"
The cheeriest play I know,
You'll find that a magic spell 'twill weave
However the wind may blow.

Nicknames of Noted Americans.

Benjamin Franklin, for some time, conducted a publication called "Poor Richard's Almanac," and he was afterward called "Poor Richard." John Randolph was called the "Political Meteor" of Congress, because of his tall, slender form, his shrill voice, and his long, bony fingers. George Washington is everywhere known as the "Father of his Country." John Adams was styled, "The Colossus of the Continental Congress." The name explains itself. Thomas Jefferson was called "The Sage of Monticello," because of his many talents. John Quincy Adams was known as "Old Man Eloquent" because of his ability in debate during his old age. Andrew Jackson was everywhere known as "Old Hickory." I cannot recall the origin of the name at present. Martin Van Buren, because of his shy, cunning ways, was called "The Fox of Kinderhook." William Henry Harrison was called "Old Tip," because of his bravery in the battle of Tippecanoe. Zachariah Taylor was the hero of the Mexican war, and the soldiers admiringly called him "Old Rough and Ready," because of his brave, determined spirit. James Buchanan was not married, consequently he was called the "Bachelor President." Abraham Lincoln had several nicknames, but the most appropriate one, the one that always clung to him, was "Honest Abe." Gen. U. S. Grant, also, had several. His mother called him "Useless Grant" because he was so dull and unhandy when a boy. He was sometimes called "The Galena Tanner," because his trade at Galena, Ill., was that of a tanner. His schoolmates at West Point called him "Uncle Sam," and after the capture of Fort Donelson he was known as "Unconditional Surrender Grant." James A. Garfield was called the "Tow Boy," because he was engaged in towing a boat on Erie canal. Grover Cleveland has such names as "Old Veto," "Old Grover," "Decoration Day Fisher," and others. Benjamin Harrison is sometimes called "Young Tippecanoe." And now going back to revolutionary times, Gen. Israel Putnam was called "Old Put." Gen. Marion had two nicknames, "The Bayard of the South," and "The Swamp Fox." Gen. Anthony Wayne, because of his high temper and daring bravery, was called "Mad Anthony." The great orator and statesman Henry Clay was called "The Silver-tongued Orator" because of his eloquence in speech, and he was also styled "The Great Pacificator" because he brought forth so many bills. Stephen A. Douglass was known as "The Little Giant," because of his short, heavy form. He was what one could appropriately term a "big little-man." Among the officers of the civil war may be mentioned: Gen. Robert E. Lee, who was familiarly called "Uncle Robert." Gen. Thomas J. Jackson was best known by the name "Stonewall Jackson," which he received at the battle of Bull Run. Gen. Geo. B. McClellan was called "Little Mac." Gen. George H. Thomas was called "The Rock of Chickamauga" because of his courage and firmness in that bloody battle. Gen. Joseph Hooker was admiringly called "Fighting Joe," a name which needs no explanation. Gen. W. S. Hancock was called "The White Horseman of Gettysburg," because he rode a large white horse in that famous battle. Gen. William T. Sherman is admiringly called "Uncle Billy." Gen. Philip H. Sheridan was called "Little Phil." Gen. John A. Logan was called "The Black Eagle of Illinois." Gen. Kilpatrick was called "Kill." Salmon P. Chase was commonly called "Old Greenbacks" during the war, when he was secretary of the treasury, because he established our present system of national currency. Daniel W. Voorhees, the noted United States Senator, is often called "The Tall Sycamore of the Wabash" because his tall figure and long limbs are strongly characteristic of the tall sycamore tree, which is common to his home on the Wabash. James G. Blaine is admiringly called "The Plumed Knight." Colonel Ingersoll gave him the name, in his great speech during the Blaine-Cleveland campaign. Samuel J. Tilden, because of his talents, was styled "The Sage of Greystone." William B. Allison, the noted United States Senator, was, in his school-days, called "Big-Eyed Bill." Among the noted American authors are: John G. Whittier, known as the "Bachelor Poet;" John G. Saxe, sometimes styled "The American Hood," because his productions resemble those of the great poet Hood. Walt Whitman is known as "The Good Gray Poet," and the name is indeed very appropriate.

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

Feeding a Boy.

It is worth something to know what it costs to feed a boy fairly well. During the investigations made by the Record of the operations of the Squeers syndicate orphan schools it was shown that, taking their own somewhat doubtful figures, the cost was about four cents a meal. But the syndicate orphans were not well fed.

Dr. McKinnon, the superintendent of the Mimico Industrial school in Canada, has furnished the Toronto Mail with an interesting statement on the subject. There are one hundred and eight boys in the school who are kept in good bodily health, and whose subsistence is bought in a wholesale way that would somewhat cheapen the cost as compared with ordinary household expenditure. The boys hav all they wish to eat, and the superintendent's accounts, not being complicated by expenses for subsistence for other persons, furnish valuable data not otherwise readily obtainable. The following statement shows the average weekly expenditure per boy:

	Cents.
Flour	18
Oatmeal and other meal	½
Barley and beans	½
Rice, sago, etc	8 4-10
Coffee, cocoa, and tea	2 3 10
Sugar and sirups	7 3-10
Salt, pepper, and other condiments	½
Fresh fruits	1
Fruits preserved and dried	½
Fresh meat and fish	17 2-10
Meat and fish cured	1 8 10
Butter and cheese	8 1-10
Other provisions	3 2 10
Vegetables	24
Milk	14
Total	$1.07 3-10

The cost of food, as above given, does not include the expense of preparing it, or incidental expenditure for superintendence, etc. But the average disbursement is astonishingly small. So far as subsistence goes, to raise a boy is not more costly than to raise a pig.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Minister (to boy with a long pole): "I hope you are not going fishing in the creek on this beautiful Sabbath day?" Boy (emphatically): "No, sir, I am not." "That's right—you're a good boy. Here's a nickel." (After the minister's departure.) "Golly! If he'd asked me wuz I goin' fishing in the mill-pond he'd had me sure."

While loading sugar on our boat on Sunday recently at a Louisiana plantation, some of the passengers strolled back toward the settlement, and went into a church just as a couple had taken their child in for baptism. The old colored preacher, noticing the large crowd of white visitors, extended them a cordial welcome, and asked all to be seated; then, turning to the couple before him, asked: "Ob what denomination am dis chile?" "Sah?" said the young father, evidently perplexed by the word denomination. "I axed yo' ob what denomination de chile war," repeated the minister, a little severely. The parents looked at each other in evident confusion for a moment, then the father stammered out, "I—we—doesn't know what yo' mean by denomination, sah." "Huh, yo' don't!" replied the preacher scornfully. "Well, den, I'll simplify it 'cordin' to yo' ign'ance so yo' kin understand it; am de chile a boy or a gal chile?"

Nice young man (lecturing the dear little boys and girls in Sunday-school): "Now, dear children, is there any of you who would like to ask me a question about what I hav been trying, in my poor way, to tell you? Well, the little boy in the back row—you need not snap your fingers, little boy, I see you. What question would you like to ask, my son?" Nice little boy: "Say, is dis jawin' goin' ter last all day?"

The name Jimmy Eaton is not very common—not nearly so common as John Smith, for instance—but after reading the following story one cannot think that the boy Jimmy Eaton is to be found almost anywhere. Some readers of the Companion may know not only such a boy, but such a man. A schoolmaster was placed over a new school. His ambition was roused; he wanted to make that the very best school that ever was. He pondered a good while and concluded that the best way to get at his object was to rouse a spirit of self-respect and self-improvement in the pupils. So one day he talked to them earnestly, and finally he said, thinking he had made the subject very plain to them all: "Now, boys, I believe there is just one way to do this thing. If each of you will make up his mind to mend one boy's faults, the whole school will be improved in a very short time." "All right, sir," spoke up little Jimmy Eaton, who had been very much interested in the discussion; "I'll mend Jack Wyeth."—Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

HOME CITY, KAN., Jan. 19, 1890.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: I go to school and my studies are reading, spelling, and arithmetic. My tutor's name is Ernest Ranoe, and I like him very well. I hav one brother and one sister. I was nine years old on the 19th of December. This is my first writing. Respectfully yours,

OTTO VOGLER.

JORDAN, MINN., Jan. 13, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines, for the first time. My grandma has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for five years. My papa is dead, and my mamma is not at home. I liv with my grandma and grandpa. I hav a doll as big as a live baby. It has a lounge big enough for me to lie on. It has a bed, too. Two of my aunts are living at home, and one uncle. We had a Christmas tree. I got a chair and a trunk. This is all I can write to-day. I hope to see my letter in print. Your little friend,

MINNIE TAYLOR.

ORANGE CITY, IA., Jan. 12, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to the Children's Corner. This is a dreadfully religious town. They hav had prayer-meeting here for a whole week. I am going to school and hope to pass through it by the end of this year's term. We hav a few Liberals in this town. I am fifteen years of age and an orphan. My mother died when I was about three years old and my father when I was about six years old. I am staying with my brother, who is a doctor. I take care of his horses, four in all. They are all fat and sleek and very gentle. Well, I think this is enough for the first time, so I will close.

Yours truly, HENRY DE LESPINASSE.

TUSCALOOSA, ALA., Jan. 10, 290.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not get it to read now, as I am away at school, but I miss it very much. I am just home from church. I do not want to go. I hav to. It makes me so mad to hear the preacher talk about the Infidel when I cannot help myself. I wish that some Liberal lecturer would come down here, for I am so anxious for the spread of Freethought. The Christians are working on their side as hard as they can. I am the only Liberal girl here that I know of, and I shall remain so as long as I liv.

Your Liberal friend, FLORENCE WARD.

News of the Week.

PORTUGAL has yielded to England in the quarrel over African territory.

RUSSIA has banished thirty-three persons, mostly Polish and German nobles.

AT Guthrie claim-jumping has caused disturbances that it required troops to quiet.

THOMAS HILL, D.D., was providentially stricken with paralysis while preaching at Highlands, Mass., on the 19th ult.

NELLIE BLY, sent around the globe by the New York World, made the unprecedented record of 72 days, 6 hours, 11 minutes.

IF Portugal revolts, inspired by Brazil, Spain may follow, and like disturbances may succeed in Germany and throughout Europe.

THE neighborhood of Reading, Pa., is overrun with an army of burglars, who are supposed to hav their lair in the Welsh mountains.

ON the 22d ult. an infant of thirteen days, son of W. Wreschinski, of New York city, died from circumcision performed by Rabbi Aaron.

BOULANGISTS created such a scene of disorder in the French chamber the other day that troops were called in to remove their leader.

THE Polish church war at Wilkesbarre, Pa., culminated in a riot at a funeral on the 20th ult., and several constables were required to restore peace.

AT Buffalo, N. Y., last Sunday, a fight took place in the Polish Roman Catholic church between factions in the congregation for and against the priest, that was quelled only by a squad of police.

COMPLAINTS having been made to Mayor Odell of Newburg, N. Y., of the crying of Sunday newspapers on the streets and before open church doors, he has ordered rigid enforcement of the law against all who disturb the quiet of the day.

THE London News says that Turkey will demand, through her minister, of the United States government that it suppress the Sourhantag, an Armenian paper printed in the United States but circulated in Armenia, which advocates Armenian independence.

AN eminent friend of the papacy reports from Rome that the pope's advisers are urging him to declare for woman suffrage, as "woman in Europe is the main prop of the church, and to enfranchise her would place the Freethinker everywhere in a minority."

THE Quebec legislature has enacted that one hundred acres of land be given each head of a family of twelve children. The Roman Catholic French Canadians are already multiplying fast enough, without this inducement, to make a plenty of trouble in the future. Many couples now hav fifteen to twenty children.

MR. STEAD, the London editor, writes from Italy that he is "officially authorized to declare that the pope is utterly and absolutely opposed to any attack being made upon Italy for the purpose of restoring his temporal power by force of arms." But we may suppose Leo's secret wishes to be quite otherwise. And to condemn such action is to reflect upon the conduct of Pius IX. in 1849, and innumerable other predecessors.

DOM PEDRO still declines to abdicate. He says he will return to his people as emperor, as president, or as private citizen. He thinks the new government will be permanent unless an attempt to erect a military dictatorship is made. He says the revolution arose solely from the slaveholders' vow to revenge themselvs on him if he helped to free their slaves. Castelar, the famous Freethinker and statesman of Spain, censures Dom Pedro, and says that the ex-emperor while gaining by display much credit for Liberalism, had very little.

THE reapportionment of presidential electors to follow this year's census will add new electors as follows: Alabama 2, Arkansas 2, California 1, Colorado 1, Georgia 2, Indiana 1, Iowa 1, Kansas 2, Kentucky 1, Louisiana 1, Maryland 1, Minnesota 3, Mississippi 1, Missouri 4, Nebraska 3, New Jersey 1, New York 1, North Carolina 2, Ohio 2, Pennsylvania 1, Texas 2, and Wisconsin 1. The four new states will probably hav 14 electoral votes, South Dakota 4, Washington 4, Montana 3, and North Dakota 3. Thus the South will gain 17 electors, the West 25, the Middle states 3, and the Pacific states 4. New England will lose 1. New York will retain the deciding power.

It seems hardly worth while to call attention of old-time radical thinkers to "Plain Home Talk," since probably most of them are familiar with it. Yet there may be some such who hav lost or loaned their copies of the work and who would be glad to get a new copy of the latest revised edition. To the younger generations of Liberals and to recent converts to Freethought literature "Plain Home Talk" is a book that offers much of interest in the line of radical thought on marriage and social relations, besides much very valuable instruction concerning physiology, hygiene, and what it is well for everyone to know concerning disease, its causes, prevention, and treatment.—Truth Seeker.

WHICH IS THE WORSE?

Notes and Clippings.

THE London authorities hav put a stop to the holding of lotteries for the benefit of charitable institutions, which hav heretofore been winked at when quietly conducted.

AN indication of the spread of English as a language is given by the fact that it has just been chosen for use in the recording of important treaty engagements between Russia and China.

BISHOP HOGAN, and several Catholic newspaper organs, pronounce the population estimate of the Catholic Directory imperfect, and think there are 13,000,000 Catholics in the Union.

THIS is what the Reporters' Magazine (England) says: "If you want to make journalism pay, hav nothing whatever to do with any of the religious papers if you can help it, as the majority of them pay very niggardly, whilst one or two are downright frauds."

TALMAGE, when in the East, was forced to giv his testimony to the devoutness of Mohammedans. He says that not one in a hundred thousand Christians would venture in public places to demonstrate his religious faith in the manners customary to the followers of the false prophet.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 8th is to giv a symposium. It has solicited the opinions of a number of Liberals as to the positiv and constructiv side of Freethought. Any Liberal can giv an opinion. What the cause needs is fifty millions of dollars wisely expended in sledgehammers to knock theology's head off and Jehovah's.—Ironclad Age.

THE lords of the admiralty hav just officially reprimanded an engineer cadet, who, when asked, "How would you proceed to get steam up?" replied: "Tighten your funnel stays and regulate your funnel drafts, then look up to our father, and say, 'I am ready to go home if the boiler front comes out.'"

ACCORDING to the Rev. Dr. T. A. Fernley, of Philadelphia, there are in that city two hundred and eighty-three Personal Liberty Leagues, representing thirty-five thousand men, who will next autumn show their hand in politics and send men to Harrisburg to repeal the laws protecting the American Sabbath.

MR. BRADLAUGH is on his way home, very much improved in health and spirits, says the London Freethinker of January 19th. He will meet the members of the National Secular Society at the Hall of Science, London, on Sunday, February 16th, and giv a full statement of his reasons for resigning the presidency. The meeting will elect Mr. Bradlaugh's successor.

THERE is a very trite old saying, says the Concordia, Kan., Blade, which it is to be hoped will not lose its force in the present controversy between Catholics and Protestants concerning the Indian schools. It is that "when thieves fall out honest men get their dues." It has been a "fat take" for those churches, this Indian school business; has furnished many an "easy sit" for lazy clergymen, and who hav pocketed millions of the people's money under the pretense of educating the Indians, when the chief thing done was to draw the salary. A million dollars a year is thus squandered.

THERE is an agitation in Paris in favor of giving to women engaged in business the right that men similarly engaged hav—to vote in the choice of judges before whom come for settlement matters of commercial litigation. The scheme is advocated by many of the leading French politicians, who refuse to be frightened by the idea that this will be only an entering wedge for universal female suffrage.

I ONCE said to a zealous Christian—naturally a good, kind-hearted woman, an Equal Suffragist and advocate of Sunday laws—writes Lillie D. White in Fair Play: "The trend of this religious sentiment supported by legal enactments is toward enforcing attendance at church; would you favor such a law?" "Why, yes," she said, "until they would attend willingly." Really, the cold chills ran down my back, and visions of racks, thumbscrews, and hot pincers floated before me.

AT a recent meeting of the Photographic Society of Geneva, Switzerland, Professor H. Fol presented a paper on resemblances in married couples. According to the British Journal of Photography, he stated that, out of seventy-eight young couples photographed for the purpose of his investigations, he found that in twenty-four cases the resemblance in the personal appearance of the husband and wife was greater than that of brother and sister, in thirty cases it was equally great, and in only twenty-four was there a total absence of resemblance.

THE Rev. Mr. Roach, editor of the Windsor Weekly Waterspout, went fishing a few Sundays ago and broke his leg. The Rev. Mr. Dace heard of the accident and in his Sunday evening sermon said: "Here we hav a striking example of the retribution following the violation of the Sabbath. If Mr. Roach had been at church he would not hav broken his leg." The following Sunday, as the Rev. Mr. Dace was ascending the steps of the pulpit, he trod on a piece of orange peel dropped by a child of the Sunday-school, slipped, fell, and broke his leg. The next issue of the Waterspout contained the following: "Here we hav a striking instance of the retribution that waits on self-appointed censorship. If the Rev. Mr. Dace had been fishing he would not hav broken his leg."

THE Pearl of Days laments: "Hoboken is keeping up its old reputation for Sabbath desecration. Fifty or sixty years ago it was impossible to hold a Sunday evening service in the old school-house (for there was no church there then) until the last day boat had left the ferry for New York. The Elysian Field attracted crowds from this city, who "neither feared God nor regarded man." Ball-playing, quoit-pitching, and other noisy games were practiced under the windows of the little place of worship, and there was no law and no one to prevent the annoyances. Now Sunday theatricals are not only permitted, but as the Argus of January 27th says: "The police never lift a hand to cry a halt. Not they. The only movement noticeable on their part is a lowering and raising of the upper left eyelid. More than this, the law seems even to be assaulted by its very servants, for a policeman is on duty at Jacobs's theater, Sunday, at both performances, to preserve order."

DESTRUCTIVE, CONSTRUCTIVE, OR BOTH?

Is Freethought a System of Negation Solely, or a Constructive Philosophy ample in itself to replace Religion?

Is there an Affirmative, Positive, Constructive side to Freethought?
If not, the reason why?
If there be, in what, in your opinion, does it consist, and in what should it consist?

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll:

"Is there an affirmative, positive, constructive side to Freethought?"

The object of the Freethinker is to ascertain the truth—the conditions of well-being—to the end that this life will be made of value. This is the affirmative, positive, and constructive side.

Without liberty there is no such thing as real happiness. There may be the contentment of the slave—of one who is glad that he has passed the day without a beating—one who is happy because he has had enough to eat—but the highest possible idea of happiness exists only with freedom.

All religious systems enslave the mind. Certain things are demanded—certain things must be believed—certain things must be done—and the man who becomes the subject or servant of this superstition must give up all idea of individuality or hope of intellectual growth and progress.

The religionist informs us that there is somewhere in the universe an orthodox God, who is endeavoring to govern the world, and who for this purpose resorts to famine and flood, to earthquake and pestilence—and who, as a last resort, gets up a revival of religion. That is called "affirmative and positive."

The man of sense knows that no such God exists, and thereupon he affirms that the orthodox doctrine is infinitely absurd. This is called a "negation." But to my mind it is an affirmation, and is a part of the positive side of Freethought.

A man who compels this deity to abdicate his throne renders a vast and splendid service to the human race.

As long as men believe in tyranny in heaven they will practice tyranny on earth. Most people are exceedingly imitative, and nothing is so gratifying to the average orthodox man as to be like his God.

These same Christians tell us that nearly everybody is to be punished forever, while a few fortunate Christians who were elected and selected billions of ages before the world was created, are to be happy. This they call "the tidings of great joy." The Freethinker denounces this doctrine as infamous beyond the power of words to express. He says, and says clearly, that a God who would create a human being knowing that that being was to be eternally miserable, must of necessity be an infinite fiend.

The free man, into whose brain the serpent of superstition has not crept, knows that the dogma of eternal pain is an infinite falsehood. He also knows—if the dogma be true—that every decent human being should hate, with every drop of his blood, the creator of the universe. He also knows—if he knows anything—that no decent human being could be happy in heaven with a majority of the human race in hell. He knows that a mother could not enjoy the society of Christ with her children in perdition; and if she could, he knows that such a mother is simply a wild beast. The free man knows that the angelic hosts, under such circumstances, could not enjoy themselves unless they had the hearts of boa constrictors.

It will thus be seen that there is an affirmative, a positive, a constructive side to Freethought. What is the positive side?

First. A denial of all orthodox falsehoods—an exposure of all superstitions. This is simply clearing the ground, to the end that seeds of value may be planted. It is necessary, first, to fell the trees, to destroy the poisonous vines, to drive out the wild beasts. Then comes another phase—another kind of work. The Freethinker knows that the universe is natural—that there is no room, even in infinite space, for the miraculous, for the impossible. The Freethinker knows, or feels that he knows, that there is no sovereign of the universe who, like some petty king or tyrant, delights in showing his authority. He feels that all in the universe are conditioned beings, and that only those are happy who live in accordance with the conditions of happiness, and that this fact or truth or philosophy embraces all men and all Gods—if there be Gods.

The positive side is this: That every good action has good consequences—that it bears good fruit forever—and that every bad action has evil consequences, and bears bad fruit. The Freethinker also asserts that every man must bear the consequences of his actions—that he must reap what he sows, and that he cannot be justified by the goodness of another, or damned for the wickedness of another.

There is still another side, and that is this: The Freethinker knows that all the priests and cardinals and popes know nothing of the supernatural—they know nothing about gods or angels or heavens or hells—nothing about inspired books or Holy Ghosts, or incarnations or atonements. He knows that all this is superstition pure and simple. He knows also that these people—from pope to priest, from bishop to parson, do not the slightest good in this world—that they live upon the labor of others—that they earn nothing themselves—that they contribute nothing toward the happiness, or the well-being, or the wealth, of mankind. He knows that they trade and traffic in ignorance and fear, that they make merchandise of hope and grief—and he also knows that in every religion the priest insists on five things; First: There is a God; Second: He has made known his will; Third: He has selected me to explain this message; Fourth: We will now take up a collection, and Fifth: Those who fail to subscribe will certainly be damned.

The positive side of Freethought is to find out the truth—the facts of nature—to the end that we may take advantage of those truths, of those facts—for the purpose of feeding and clothing and educating mankind.

In the first place, we wish to find that which will lengthen human life—that which will prevent or kill disease—that which will do away with pain—that which will preserve or give us health.

We also want to go in partnership with these forces of nature, to the end that we may be well fed and clothed—that we may have good houses that protect us from heat and cold. And beyond this—beyond these simple necessities—there are still wants and aspirations, and free thought will give us the highest possible in art—the most wonderful and thrilling in music—the greatest paintings, the most marvelous sculpture—in other words, free thought will develop the brain to its utmost capacity. Free thought is the mother of art and science, of morality and happiness.

It is charged by the worshipers of the Jewish myth, that we destroy, that we do not build.

What have we destroyed? We have destroyed the idea that a monster created and governs this world—the declaration that a God of infinite mercy and compassion upheld slavery and polygamy and commanded the destruction of men, women, and babes. We have destroyed the idea that this monster created a few of his children for eternal joy, and the vast majority for everlasting pain. We have destroyed the infinite absurdity that salvation depends upon belief, that investigation is dangerous, and that the torch of reason lights only the way to hell. We have taken a grinning devil from every grave, and the curse from death—and in the place of these dogmas, of these infamies, we have put that which is natural and that which commends itself to the heart and brain.

Instead of loving God, we love each other. Instead of the religion of the sky—the religion of this world—the religion of the family—the love of husband for wife, of wife for husband—the love of all for children. So that now the real religion is: Let us live for each other; let us live for this world, without regard for the past and without fear for the future. Let us use our faculties and our powers for the benefit of ourselves and others—knowing that if there be another world, the same philosophy that gives us joy here will make us happy there.

Nothing can be more absurd than the idea that we can do something to please or displease an infinite being. If our thoughts and actions can lessen or increase the happiness of God, then to that extent God is the slave and victim of man.

The energies of the world have been wasted in the service of a phantom—millions of priests have lived on the industry of others and no effort has been spared to prevent the intellectual freedom of mankind.

We know if we know anything that supernatural religion has no foundation except falsehood and mistake. To expose these falsehoods—to correct these mistakes—to build the fabric of civilization on the foundation of demonstrated truth—is the task of the Freethinker. To destroy guideboards that point in the wrong direction—to correct charts that lure to reef and wreck—to drive the fiend of fear from the mind—to protect the cradle from the serpent of superstition and dispel the darkness of ignorance with the sun of science—is the task of the Freethinker.

To ascertain the limitations of the mind, the conditions of happiness—to do away with poverty and crime—with cathedrals and prisons—with popes and paupers—with kings and slaves—with the selfishness of the fortunate few and the sufferings of the many—is the task of the Freethinker.

What constructive work has been done by the church? Christianity gave us a flat world a few thousand years old—a heaven above it where Jehovah dwells and a hell below it where most people will dwell. Christianity took the ground that a certain belief was necessary to salvation and that this belief was far better and of more importance than the practice of all the virtues. It became the enemy of investigation—the bitter and relentless foe of reason and the liberty of thought. It committed every crime and practiced every cruelty in the propagation of its creed. It drew the sword against the freedom of the world. It established schools and universities for the preservation of ignorance. It claimed to have within its keeping the source and standard of all truth. If the church had succeeded the sciences could not have existed.

Free thought has given us all that we have of value. It has been the great constructive force. It is the only discoverer, and every science is its child.

R. G. Ingersoll.

The President of the American Secular Union:
Not this or that, but this and that.

Yes, of course there is an affirmative side to Freethought, else it would not be worthy of an existence. Direct denial is in fact a form of affirmation. If we deny the supernatural we affirm the natural, but if we affirm the material we do not necessarily deny the spiritual, as spirit may exist within matter, may be a property of matter, may exist in matter so ethereal as not to be perceptible to the ordinary senses, or subject to the laws of matter in its grosser forms, or for aught we know may exist independent of matter. Indeed, this was in part the doctrine of Bruno, who said, "A spirit exists in all things, and no body is so small but it contains a part of the divine substance within itself, by which it is animated;" and Haeckel has expressed the opinion that "all matter in a certain sense is alive." I am in favor of an aggressive policy. We should not cease to vigorously deny certain false allegations of modern theologians, but we should be ready with our reasons for denying them. We should assert a positive system of morality, with the reasons for it. For everything that we tear down, we should furnish some substitute. But the work of construction must necessarily be preceded by the work of destruction. I believe in "destructive criticism" for this very reason. Let me illustrate. I flatly deny the story in Genesis of the fall of man. But I do not merely deny. I show that this story came down in certain books of comparatively modern date, and that it was current among many oriental nations long before Genesis was written, and that the cuneiform tablets of Assyria prove that it was well known to that people two thousand years before the time that Moses is said to have lived. It also appears that it was regarded as a fable among them, and not as the history of a real transaction. The Jews were captive in Babylon and learned the story of Eden there, and then claimed that they long ago received it as a special revelation! But as the other writings of the Old Testament do not contain any reference to Adam and the fall, it is certain from this and other circumstances that it was not known to them previous to the captivity. Now the entire "redemptive scheme" of modern theology is founded upon the fall, and as that is a myth all that depends upon it must be mythical. So with regard to the origin of man. We not only deny that in the morning of a certain day there was no man, and that in the afternoon he stood up in the majesty of his manhood, full grown and bearded; but we affirm and show how he was created by successive evolutions, from the lower forms, which took millions of years, and that his present imperfections show but partial developments, which are to be overcome in the natural course of events.

It is easy to build up a system of Ethics, founded upon science and reason, which cannot fail to command the attention of the thoughtful. We ought to do it. There is undoubtedly a positive and constructive side to Freethought. We take things as they are known to exist, and we construct a theory of the universe. The first principle is, that all things are governed by law; which is universal, and uniform. To be in harmony with the laws of the universe is man's chief good. This is what may be called Natural Religion. Let not the Freethinking reader be startled at this word "religion." I know that it has been perverted to such vile uses that one almost detests it. But nevertheless it is something real. Even Professor Tyndall says: "The facts of religious feeling are to me as certain as the facts of physics." "The world will have religion of some kind." "You who have escaped from these religions into the high and dry light of intellect may deride them, but in doing so you deride accidents of form merely, and fail to touch the immovable basis of the religious sentiment in the nature of man. To yield this sentiment reasonable satisfaction is the problem of problems at this hour." Renan, also, writes thus: "All the symbols which serve to give shape to the religious sentiment are imperfect, and their fate is, to be one after another rejected. But nothing is more remote from the truth than the dream of those who seek to imagine a perfected humanity without religion." "Devotion is as natural as egoism to a true-born man. The organization of devotion is religion. Let no one hope, therefore, to dispense with religion or religious associations. Each progression of modern society will render this want more imperious." The common acceptation of the word religion is bondage—"to bind back." It was not thus understood until Lactantius so used it in the fourth century—for a theological reason. Cicero did not so use it four hundred years before, and he may be supposed to have been master of his own vernacular. He used it in the sense of scruple—a natural obligation wholly irrespective of the gods. It is the great fact of duty, of oughtness. It consists in an earnest endeavor to realize ideal excellence and to transform it into character. Against every vice there is a reason and in favor of every virtue there are many reasons. These have no regard for any supernatural person. Right is right, and wrong is wrong—always, everywhere, and forever! To seek one and reject the other is Natural Religion. This Freethinkers ought, in every possible way, to teach and practice. Yes, practice. This is the most potent argument. Wherever it is possible, meetings should be held for the purpose. Music should be invoked. The "Cosmian Hymn Book," or something like it, should be used. It is to be hoped that the Manual for which the American Secular Union has offered the $1,000 prize, will prove eminently helpful in this regard. We need it in our families. What are Freethinkers doing to instruct the children of the land—their own children? We have a system of morality, and should actively teach it, from the rostrum, and through the press. Would it not be wise for us to organize, and adopt something like the plans of the Ethical Culturists, with improvements? Let us have Sunday-schools for the proper instruction of both children and adults. Can we do better than accept what has come to be known as the Golden Rule? It is preëminently natural, and does not claim to be "revelation," having been uttered in various forms quite as explicit and beautiful as in the so-called Sermon on the Mount, by divers persons seven centuries before. We have no time to dispute about the question of a personal God or a future state. The world is given to "Bibleolatry." Let us show that we need no Bible—or rather, that we need them all, just as we need the science of geology, to show how things have been developed, how things have grown out of one another and been modified by circumstances. Let us break every image, and do all the good we can, to all the persons we can, and as long as we can! Let us adopt as our motto, "In things proved, Unity; in whatsoever can be doubted, Free Diversity; in things not trenching upon others' rights, Liberty; in all things, Charity." R. B. Westbrook.

The President of the Canadian Secular Union:

To the question, "Is there an affirmative, positive, constructive side to Freethought?" I answer, There is no other side. The whole essence of Freethought is the expression of the assured, absolute, productive principle of mental liberty; the principle which has been the cause of all the past progress of human society and is the only means of its future advancement. Every step in the onward march of humanity has been owing to the excursion of the mind of man beyond the sphere of "revealed" or authoritative statement. It is because someone has thought in contrariety to received opinions or in advance of accepted knowledge that improvement has taken place. The destruction that attends the Freethought avowal is simply an incident in its constructive work. No man is accused as a destroyer because he is demolishing old buildings, preparatory to using the site for improved structures or more useful purposes. Nor is the policy a destructive one which is leveling the medieval hovels of superstition in order to erect the palace of Reason.

When a railway is being built, no one brings the charge of destructiveness against the contractor, who tunnels the mountains and levels the hills; unless this railing accusation is brought by the woodchucks whose holes are annihilated. No friend of progress can denounce the Freethought cause for its removal of obstacles to the advance of mental freedom; it will be only those whose vested interests or private tastes are interfered with who will raise the cry of reproach, or else those who consider that the woodchuck holes of ignorance are better for mankind than the pathway of science.

The only principle of construction successfully practiced by mankind in modern times is the Freethought idea of naturalism. We read that formerly, divine revelations told men how to make tabernacles, arks, temples, priests' clothes, and other things not strictly essential to human welfare; and when overpowering forces besieged cities they were dispersed by angels or other supernatural visitations. But in latter days none of these things happen. It is those who study and labor for the discovery and application of natural forces who gain achievements. There is no well-authenticated statement of any result from dependence on a guidance superior to man's knowledge.

The persons engaged in destruction are the kings, who control armies for conquest abroad and to enforce submission at home to the powers that be; the priests, who control the minds of the people and induce them to live for God and heaven instead of for man and earth. All who are successfully engaged in construction are practicing the Freethought principles—liberty of free inquiry and reliance upon natural causes. This is the mission of Freethought, to teach men these constructive methods. As an organization it need not enter upon the application of its teachings any further than is necessary for their illustration. To the individuals who have secured the tools may be left the undertakings that will benefit society. The province of the organization is to see that all men have the right tools and to induce them to discard the implements of prayer and praise and replace them with the instruments of learning and labor. The man who sees another trying to saw wood with a hammer, and persuades him to lay aside his hammer and use a saw, although he has destroyed belief in the hammer, is aiding construction. So a Freethinker who induces a man to cease dependence upon God's help and use his own right arm and his knowledge of natural forces is in every sense a constructionist. The cry of destructiveness is raised by those who, having no resource in argument, find abuse to be their only weapon. This preaching of the natural principles of the construction of human society is the grandest work that can be engaged in. It would be a great mistake if Freethought societies turned their attention to founding schools and colleges and charitable institutions, save here and there, as a type of what is needed. The want of these things is generally felt and they are sure to be supplied. What is most desirable is to inspire men with the enthusiasm for humanity and teach them the methods of conferring benefits. To do this involves the destruction of "the works of the devil," among which Christian superstition holds high rank, but the aim of the destroyer is affirmative, positive, and constructive. He always puts something better in the place of what he pulls down. Reason and common sense are always substituted for belief in miracles.

A great revival is called for in this positive work—the destruction of Christianity and construction of Rationalism. Why will not men consecrate themselves as preachers of mental freedom? Why will not men of means contribute to the spread of rational literature? Where is there a more constructive work than that of the "Literature Fund" of The Truth Seeker, which sends pamphlets to all the legislators of a new state? Let Secular Unions do all they can to secure reforms, but let Freethought continue its holy mission of proclaiming the principles upon which all human reforms must proceed. This is the most important work of all. Every Freethinker should see that his town has an organized center for speaking their ideas and circulating their literature; and every man of wealth, who has been emancipated from superstition, should feel that his first duty is to free the mind of his fellow-men from the blighting curse of supernatural belief. A rich Freethinker who was appealed to for funds for the propagandist work of a society, declined, saying: "I doubt if any good is done in that way. The men engaged in this work are seldom calculated to gain new adherents. They are generally too vituperative. And the same may be said of their newspapers, which are never, I imagine, self-supporting. The growth of liberal views in religious matters is a steady, silent one—not much affected by argument and only retarded by abuse." No wonder that papers languish and good men cannot be supported in the lecture field when such indifference exists among those who possess the means to flood the country with light.

To sum up and condense my answer, I would say: Freethought in its essence is the affirmation that the world is controled by natural laws and that man's welfare depends upon the knowledge of these laws, which is only to be gained by the inquiry that proceeds from mental liberty. The duty of Freethinkers is to proclaim these truths, which of necessity must destroy the dogmas of theology and supernatural religion. But the object is not destruction; it is the uplifting of humanity, which is only possible by the removal of the superstitions that oppress it and by giving it the principle and power of self-help. To this positive, constructive work reason calls every Liberal. Robert C. Adams.

An American Secular Union Director's Opinions:

In answer to the first question, "Is there an affirmative, positive, constructive side of Freethought?" one can only say Yes, for to say No, is to ignore the large amount of Freethought literature that is devoted to this side of it; but had the first question been, "Is there necessarily a constructive side of Freethought?" there would have been more chance for difference of opinion, and more occasion to say something in reply to the second question, "If not, the reason why?"

When a mind has shaken itself free of the shackles of superstition and come out into the "open" of Freethought, the dominant thought is apt to be the importance (and some will feel the duty) of freeing all other minds, as fast as possible, from the binding limitations of the supernatural creeds; but here it is possible for the Freethinker to take the stand that this is enough, that when the weeds are pulled out the crop of truth will have full opportunity to grow and produce its best results, and that there is no necessity of building up a religion, philosophy, or system of morality, since these are bound to grow, develop, or evolute into the best forms when all hindrances to the free operation of the human mind shall have been removed. This may be regarded as a legitimate idea and consistent position for an earnest Freethinker, and there is plenty for him to do preparing the way for Freethought by clearing away the tangled underbrush of superstition and felling the darkening forests of supernaturalism which are so industriously fostered by the prevailing creeds, sects, churches of to-day; but there are others among Freethinkers with minds of a positive and constructive order, and they are not content with pioneer clearing work—they are impatient to erect new structures for the abode of man in the spaces already cleared. Some build fantastic air castles, some sketch plans for things "as they should be," some lay the foundation for things that are likely to be.

In reply to the last question my idea is that practical constructive Freethought work to-day is that which looks toward bettering the state of mankind on earth, in worldly ways, with reference to this life only, and which is based upon what science has already revealed of man's place in nature. For instance, having outgrown the superstition that diseases are inflicted upon men by a capricious or angry God, and learning instead that they are largely the result of personal vices and avoidable causes, we are ready to begin the construction of a positive science of "preventive medicine." Learning that vicarious atonement is an impossibility, physically at any rate, and observing that it is a scientific verity that the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children, we can begin to study how to improve the heritage of the coming generations—how to begin to remodel mankind, constructively and radically, by the science of homo-culture. Recognizing that our only certain hope of immortality is in the perpetuation of ourselves in the best products of our thought and best seed of our bodies, the generation of children of mind and of body that shall be "fit to survive," we have the greatest incentive to acquire and apply all available science to the construction and reconstruction of body, mind, character, soul—all the mortal and immortal principles that may rightfully appertain to perfect humanity. E. B. Foote, Jr.

The Editor of the London "Agnostic Journal:"

Freethought undoubtedly has an Affirmative, Positive, or Constructive side. Strictly speaking, this is the only side it has. Destruction and Negation do not constitute a side to Freethought, they simply represent a phase of its operation while it energizes toward positive expression. There is so much bondthought, so much quasi-thinking in carefully prescribed limits, so much mental subserviency to conventionalism, sacerdotalism, and dogma that, accidentally, Freethought has to plunge into the task of Negation and Destruction, and the impugning of old fables preparatory to the formulating of new facts. To such an extent is this the case that, to the superficial observer, the aggressive and vandalistic aspect of Freethought is the only aspect. One unacquainted with the nature of military operations on observing an army day after day toiling through a dense forest, here felling trees, there blasting rocks, might imagine that the felling of trees and the blasting of rocks, simple destruction, was the mission of the campaign. But the trees are felled and the rocks are blasted only because they lie on the line of march and in the path to an ulterior purpose. The forest pierced, the river is reached and construction commences—pontoon bridges are erected, savages inimical to civilization are overcome, and the region opened up as an arena for the triumph of commerce, peace, art, and literature. So it is with Freethought. Its ultimate mission is not the destruction of priestly imposture; it is the construction of popular enlightenment. But, before the enlightenment can be effected the priestcraft must be destroyed—the trees of dogma must be felled, the rocks of superstition shattered. The state of mind must be induced which alone can make Freethought possible. An atmosphere must be created in which science and philosophy can breathe before a spirit can be inspired which will make the mental serf dare to be free and acquire the faculty by which evidence is weighed and opinion arrived at. Dagon must be broken before any other god is placed on his throne. Cringing credulity must be trampled to death before the canons of criticism can be established. Faith with all its interested myrmidons must be relegated to their legitimate sphere before Reason with her devotees can make effective appeal to the conscience of mankind. Some of the most closely cherished prejudices of the race require to be ruptured before you can persuade men to give up their fetters of spiritual bondage to be beaten into the keen swords that take possession of the realm of mental liberty. In this the domain of bond-thought, Freethought has to root up the weeds before it can plant the roses. The upas of superstition has to be torn up by the roots before the tree of knowledge can flourish where it grew. But the ultimate aim of the Freethinker is to plant the tree of knowledge, not to tear up the upas. It is because the Freethinker's earnest purpose is Construction that his first duty is Destruction.

THE EDITOR OF THE "INVESTIGATOR:"

There is, in my opinion, a constructive side to Freethought. It consists in its intelligence. Free thought is an intellectual movement. Its object is to find the truth and to state the truth. It necessarily antagonizes what is false and erroneous. Freethought is a moral movement also. All true morality rests upon a right understanding of human nature, and of man's relation to his fellow-man. So far as facts are constructive, so far as knowledge and truth are constructive—Freethought has a constructive side.

I do not deny, however, that much of the work of Liberalism is destructive. It stands opposed to Christianity as a religious system and as an organized church.

The Freethought movement, in its antagonism to the religion of the day, resembles the Antislavery movement in its opposition to chattel slavery. It fights the wrong; it denounces the evil; it seeks to destroy the false, but it lifts no hand against what is right, what is good, what is true. Theology is slavery of the mind. Liberals are working to emancipate man from theological bondage. Before this emancipation can be secured all religious systems must be overthrown. I believe that our most important work is done when we free man. He must then do something. Out of liberty, out of knowledge, come the true opportunities of life. A free man is a better man than a slave; an educated man is a better man than an ignoramus. In giving freedom to the mind—the freedom that comes from enlightenment, from a knowledge of facts—we increase the intellectual and moral power of man.

Liberalism in its affirmation of human rights implies also human duties. All morality depends upon a proper respect of one's self and of others.

Freethought has no mission beyond the earth. It stands for all that is good here; it champions the home, it defends the fireside, it protects the weak. Thought and labor that aim to make man better, wiser, and truer are affirmative, positive, and constructive.

L. K. WASHBURN.

THE EDITOR OF THE "TWENTIETH CENTURY:"

There is certainly a constructive work for Liberalism to do, but it can only be accomplished by the adoption of new ideas of morality. Christian morality and Liberal morality are essentially different. Liberalism does not suppose the existence of a God who has personal relations to men. Hence it is absurd for them to think of conscience as the "voice of God." Liberalism does not suppose the supernatural origin of man. Hence we cannot reasonably say that conscience is innate. We must take the position that we learn right and wrong just as we learn all other things that we know—by observation and experience.

Liberalism cannot say that there is an abstract rule of right and wrong imposed upon us from beyond the range of human experience and to which human conduct must conform. We must come to the conclusion that whatever promotes the happiness of the individual in association with other individuals is right and whatever destroys that happiness is wrong. By happiness I mean, of course, that course of conduct or that form of enjoyment that leaves no regret. As our idea of happiness more and more approaches what we mean by welfare our standard of right and wrong will grow clearer and higher.

For a man living alone there can be no right or wrong. And as two or more men live together longer and longer they will discover how to avoid rubbing up against each other disagreeably or injuriously. And right will consist in not doing injuries of any kind one to another, and wrong will consist in doing injuries one to another.

The simple rule of right and wrong that I have stated, and that is now so well understood by Liberals, is the basis of an exceedingly better system of morals than Christianity has given the world. Christianity declares that right is what is according to the will of God, and the theologians proceed to say what the will of God is, and it sometimes turns out to be something quite fiendish. But under the Liberal rule of right and wrong no personal injury of any kind could be done to anyone under the pretext that it is right.

When a Liberal wishes to know what is right he has but to sit down with himself and decide what course will yield the most permanent self-satisfaction; what course he will look back over with the most pleasure to himself. If he can discover that he knows what he should do.

The moral motive power of Liberalism is to please and respect one's self. A low and coarse nature will doubtless go very wrong under such a motive power, but such a nature goes wrong under any system of morals. But there will always be many persons who, in seeking to do that which contributes to their highest happiness, will show to others what is the beauty of cleanness, gentleness, and consideration for others, for we can only be perfectly happy when everybody else is.

HUGH O. PENTECOST.

THE EDITOR OF "FREETHOUGHT:"

There are a number of objections which have been urged against Freethought so persistently that even Freethinkers are at last beginning to inquire whether, after all, they may not be valid and worthy of serious consideration. I suppose that every Freethinker has been assured by some Christian acquaintance: "If I believed as you do I would commit murder, arson, and theft—since there is no future punishment." Every Materialist is familiar with that other-world clincher: "If I believed that death ends all, I should commit suicide at once." We know, of course, that persons who reject the theory of future punishments commit fewer crimes than those who accept it, and we know also that the believers in a future life cling as tenaciously to this as though it were the conventional straw at which drowning men are said to catch. These objections, therefore, really amount to no more than the agitation of the air necessary to their utterance; and of the same value I regard the other objection that "Freethought is a mere negation." It is one of the trinity of theological chestnuts.

A few years ago, in 1885, I believe, I prepared an article on "The Affirmations of Liberalism," which was published as an editorial in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and afterward used as part of a campaign document by the secretary of the National Liberal League. In that article it was set forth that:

Liberalism affirms the supremacy of the human reason.

It affirms the right of free thinking.

It affirms that the universe is governed by immutable natural law.

It affirms that our duty is to ourselves and other human beings.

It affirms evolution as a fundamental truth.

It affirms that the good in human nature overbalances the evil, and that the natural tendency of humanity is toward mental and moral improvement.

It affirms the equality of all citizens before the law, regardless of religious belief or unbelief.

It affirms the supreme importance of scientific knowledge as contrasted with blind faith and superstitious guesswork.

Liberalism affirms the superiority of intellectual conquest over brute force; that is, it prefers the Liberal Club to the policeman's club as a method of producing conviction.

It affirms that, for present purposes, a world in the hand is worth two in the skies.

In a word, Liberalism affirms every demonstrated truth.

I would therefore maintain that there is "an Affirmative, Positive, Constructive side to Freethought," which consists and should consist in the foregoing affirmations, and others that may be regarded as consequent. Every fact furnishes a plank in its platform of principles. The negations of Liberalism are merely local and incidental, and are due to the fact that the Christian world has set up a body of doctrine which it is palming off upon the credulous as truth, and endeavoring to enforce upon the intelligent as divine law.

As a physician is destructive as touching the disease and constructive as touching the patient, so Liberalism is negative in its attitude toward the useless, and affirmative toward that which is worthy of preservation.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

THE EDITOR OF "THE TRUTH SEEKER'S" CHILDREN'S CORNER:

Is there an affirmative, positive, constructive side to Freethought?

In my opinion there is such a side. The very fact that it is desirable to destroy present systems would indicate that there is a better one yet to come. That there are minds filled with loathing and disgust at the contemplation of some established rules, customs, faiths, is proof that a superior ideal exists in the realm of thought and wisdom, which can and ought to be made real. So surely as calm follows storm; sunshine, showers; dawn the night, so shall there appear in the future a brighter side to the dull cloud that has shadowed the horizon of man so long. It is the very kernel hidden in the desire that leads men to break down and destroy existing systems. It is the materialization of the innate longing in the hearts of humanitarians, the longing for something better than has been known, that goes forth to shatter the old fabrics, already rotten with age and many cumbersome weights.

We remove a tattered garment to array ourselves in better robes. We put aside the old and substitute the new. We leave the dilapidated house for a better and more comfortable one. Old conditions fade and scatter, to be immediately replaced by new and more substantial ones.

What is being destroyed? Nothing but error, prejudice, falsehood, dissimulation, dishonesty, fraud, stupidity—in a word, ignorance, that, and nothing more. That which cannot be proved, which has no foundation in fact, that which binds and enslaves, that which prevents men and women from the exercise of reason and judgment, ought to go, will go. No power can hold or keep it from its just doom. That which delegates to another the power of thinking for one, or a number of intelligent beings, has no place, should have none, in a world of thought and mental freedom.

Every person must do his own thinking, must think freely, truly, energetically, if he would be saved.

Saved from what?

From ignorance, from the blunders that arise from lack of knowledge, from the lack of power to apply knowledge.

Hence, there must exist an affirmative, constructive, positive side to Freethought. It must be, in order to show the contrast to that which is, or shall be, destroyed and put aside, and because it will be a demand of the future. People have a right to ask of the iconoclast who demolishes idols and fetiches, What have you to offer in place of these things you take away? What will you substitute for this that you call untrue and unreal?

Of course there is the truth for falsehood, right for wrong, health for disease, hope and happiness for pain and unhappiness.

But the human heart craves all these and something more.

It reaches forward to grasp some philosophy of life and its myriad uses—some teaching that shall crystallize around this present life and lift it to a pedestal hitherto unknown—some lofty purpose that shall fill and thrill all with a new and glorious enthusiasm. It looks for a motive which shall lead to work, not for the benefit of self, but for the good of all—an altruistic faith.

But, it may be said, when Truth supplants Falsehood, is not that sufficient? No. There must be demonstration of truths, elucidation of the principles that are actual and eternal.

From the ashes of the ruins of the old will arise new temples responsive to the call of the emancipated.

It was right that the destroyers should come first and be many. We should never forget that out of the rubbish and debris they have brought new truths to the surface, and made them gleam and sparkle in the white light of wisdom and intelligence.

The New is to take the place of the Old. True. But it must be fashioned into shapeliness, comely in form and attractive to all.

Beautiful temples will grow into graceful proportions, and will glow with all the graces that culture and art can bestow or genius originate.

These temples should be, will be, attractive in architecture, in music, painting, statuary.

Why should not the skill and intellect of the centuries contribute to the pleasure of all? Why should not this life be the recipient of every grace and image of beauty that the mind can conceive? There is no reason why.

So there will be upreared in every town and village academies, halls of science, schools, not only to be opened one day in the week, but whose doors shall swing wide open every day. The adornments will symbolize facts in nature, and the heroes of scientific truths in marble and bronze will occupy the places held so long by "saints" and "apostles." Copernicus, Galileo, Hypatia, Bruno, and all the hosts of inventors, reformers, and martyrs of science will occupy the places long denied them.

Said Wendell Phillips once, in passing a beautiful church and beholding the figures in the stained glass of the sanctury, "The apostles are outside, not inside."

The real apostles have always been on the outside.

What will be taught in the new schools, whose pillars will be Knowledge, Wisdom, Truth, and Light? What but the vital issues?—how to make life truer, nobler, healthier, and happier—the virtues, what they are and how to practice them—how to make daily living sweet, serene, pure, and clean—how to make grand old earth an Eden of loveliness and harmonious, healthful delight.

Look abroad! See the abodes of crime, misery, want, woe, wretchedness, pollution—see the foul, disgraceful blots everywhere, speaking plainer than words of man's abuse and misuse of life—see the asylums, the jails, penitentiaries, the homes for the blind, the deaf, the incurables. Note the bloated face, the leering eyes, the slavering mouth, the staggering steps of the intemperate, the lustful gaze of the libertine, the vacant look and gibbering tones of the idiotic. Behold insanity, inanity, and pauperism everywhere—the gallows upreared in a civilized land—women bound and fettered without equal political rights, crushed, trampled upon, humiliated, enslaved.

Is there not, in sight of these things, necessity for new teaching? Is there not work for the constructionists ready and waiting for their hands?

The old teaching has been, How shall we die properly? The new doctrine shall be, How to live rightly and truly. SUSAN H. WIXON

THE EDITOR OF "FAIR PLAY:"

We must tear down—must we also build?

A denial is the opposite side of an affirmation—an affirmation is the opposite side of a denial. With every denial of a falsehood goes the affirmation of its displacing truth, or what the denier conceives to be a truth. As I look at this question, it is impossible for any man to seriously deny the truth, justice, or utility of a given statement, institution, or thing, without having in his mind the conception of something more credible, just, or useful. The affirmation is there, in thought, before the denial. Whoever attempts to reason with his neighbor in support of his own denial of the historical accuracy, equity, or usefulness of a book, organization, or utensil, is compelled to affirm something. When we deny that the capricious will of a God, or god-man, rules the cosmos, this denial is logically and necessarily accompanied in thought by the affirmation of our beliefs regarding what, for want of a better name, we call "natural law"—universal and unchangeable. Before we can understandingly deny that the state creates rights we must realize that rights, human rights, have their origin in the conditions of human existence.

One answer, then, to the first question of the Editor of this journal is, There is an affirmative side to Freethought, accompanying, complementary, and inseparably associated with the negative side. The iconoclast, whose hammer crushes the rotten rocks and the leering idols in the temple of superstition, builds nobly in the foundation stories of the fairer and freer temple of an ascending humanity. From this point of view it is readily seen that we are constantly building a system of morality, that a new philosophy is slowly but surely growing, that a new religion, if religion you may choose to call it, is evolving from the disintegrating concepts of the old, and the discoveries and prophecies of science.

Is this, then, all that we have to do? Need we to speak, write, and print, only? Is all our work to be with tongues, pens, and types? Can a system of theology, false in fact and pernicious in morals, rule the world for centuries and not make itself part and parcel of the laws, institutions, and customs of the peoples? Can the most systematic trampling of liberty, the most deliberate denial of justice, wholesale crucifixion of the best and tenderest impulses of human nature, and a very revelry of cruelty, last for a millennium and a half and not transmit to us a legacy of laws, institutions, and social customs which are despotic, anti-natural, and cruel? If the theories of our ancestors, which we of to-day combat, were erroneous, and if they lessened the sum of human happiness, as they did, what shall we say of the statutes and customs in which those ancestors embodied those false beliefs, of the superstructure of institutions which they built upon that insecure foundation? Are we rational if we harbor the hope that we can discredit the theories, but leave the customs and laws in which we find them crystallized, intact? How can anyone believe that we can tear out the foundation and yet leave the superstructure as it stands now?

It seems to me that the above questions answer themselves. That it must be apparent to all clear-thinking men and women that when the misleading and invasion-inciting creeds are eliminated, the laws and social powers which alone make them dangerous in this age, will go out with them. So long as the old authoritarian systems remain we may be sure that the old authoritarian beliefs have not lost their hold upon our race. If we do not recognize them in the creeds professed by the tyrants of our time it is simply because they do not appear in the old forms, and we lack the power of clear and close analysis. We have not vision acute enough to pierce the artful disguise in which our ancient enemy hath enrobed his wolfish body and veiled his hyena face.

The Freethinker affirms the right of private judgment, the right of each to examine and choose for him or herself, according to the light that each sees. The true Freethinker, then, will as zealously defend the right of one to differ from him as of another to agree with him. From these fundamental postulates it logically follows that no Freethinker who understands why he is a Freethinker will in any manner countenance any scheme which, in means or end, violates this principle of equal liberty, of personal choice, and individual responsibility. Therefore, he will aid all possible in such constructive reforms as, according to time, place, and means at hand, he deems of immediate importance. Of the most necessary of these, as I estimate them, may be enumerated:

1. The substitution of voluntary for compulsory methods of raising money for "public," that is, common uses. Of course, no argument is needed in order to make it clear to Freethinkers that when one's earnings are taken without his consent, are taken for any purpose which he does not regard as wise, necessary, or just, he is robbed, and the principle of the right of private judgment is violated in his person. Under this head would come these, among other, changes:

(a) Free schools, i.e., schools which are supported by those who desire them, and in which are taught those things which those who support them wish to have taught.

(b) Free mails, i.e., the mails to be carried by any person or persons who may wish to engage in such work, and who can secure the necessary patronage.

(c) Free trade, i.e., trade free from all trammels of tariffs, occupation taxes, license taxes, taxes upon products, and all other legalized thievings.

2. The establishment of a system of equitable land tenure, under which each person shall be free to apply his faculties to any portion of the earth's surface not already occupied and personally used by another.

3. The practical abrogation of all statutes intended or having the effect to create a government or other monopoly of money, and the establishment of a free, mutual, banking system.

4. The principle of private judgment, of personal choice, and individual responsibility, to be applied in the department of sex relations as fearlessly and fully as in those of religion, taxation, education, transmission of intelligence, commerce, land-holding, and issuance of the medium of exchange.

5. The formation of coöperative manufacturing and distributing associations.

There is very much other constructive and saving work in which we, as Freethinkers, can engage with peculiar fitness, bearing in mind the basic principles of our philosophy. The rational, scientific, humane treatment of the unfortunates whom we call "criminals" is a matter of vast importance. Theoretically we repudiate the anti-natural dogma of "free will," but when we have to do with criminals I am afraid that most of us are as orthodox as the orthodox themselves. And in the treatment of the sick there is need for more science, greater trust in nature's healing powers, less statute law, less empiricism. We should earnestly strive to prevent needless suffering in the preparation of our supplies of animal food. The wanton destruction of birds is another cruel wrong that loudly calls for constructive work in the way of the proper education of the young. But lack of space and time prevents further particularization in this division of the subject.

In conclusion, permit me to emphasize the argument advanced in support of the declaration that we shall never rid humanity of the pernicious creeds so long as we conserve the bad laws, invasive customs, and stifling institutions which had their origin in or have been strengthened by those creeds, and which, in turn, give them nearly all the power for harm which they to-day possess. Here is room for all the constructive work of which we are capable.

Is Catholicism Losing or Gaining Ground?

Editor Charles A. Dana, of the New York Sun, is as unsafe a religious pilot as any of the rest of the doctors of divinity. He warns the clergy that "Infidelity is more dangerous to the church than ever before," and indorses the despairing statement made before the recent Catholic congress in Baltimore by Dr. Richard H. Clarke, of New York city, that the Catholic church in this country has lost much more by the falling away of Catholic immigrants from their ancestral faith than it has gained by conversions. "Some hav thought," said Dr. Clarke, "that we hav lost more than half our immigrant population or their descendants;" and the editor of the Sun thinks the estimate is not exaggerated.

But quite a different judgment is expressed in the Sun a few days later; descanting on the great change in the character of the population of New England the editor says:

> There is no doubt that the time is rapidly approaching when the great majority of the population of New England will be of foreign blood, Irish and French Canadians more especially, and nearly all of it Roman Catholic. These foreigners are coming to take up the abandoned farm and to work the mills, and as they are so much more prolific, they will swamp out the old stock, so far, at least, as numbers go. They will also wipe away old traditions and introduce new, and will establish, are already establishing, a new moral and religious tone and new social customs and demands. The priest and not the minister will exercise the spiritual power and we shall hav another New England from top to bottom.

When Mr. Dana was entertained at a banquet in Rome by the faculty and students of the North American College, he said he never in his life felt so deeply moved, and to the applauding students he said that they were "preparing themselvs to occupy the highest stations to which man can attain in this world; for surely the noblest labor in which man can engage is to teach the way to heaven and to lead the way." And now we see how Doctor Dana attempts "to lead the way." First he warns the clergy that Infidelity is more dangerous to the church than ever before, and says that Catholicism is losing much more by the falling away of its immigrants than it is gaining by conversions, and then a few days later he prophesies that the great majority of the population of New England will soon become Roman Catholics, ruled by the priest and not the minister. And this priestly rule, he thinks, is "the noblest labor in which a man can engage."

Perhaps it would hav been a fortunate circumstance if the manuscript of that second attempt of the editor of the Sun to "lead the way to heaven" had been devoured by the office cat.

When you see an editorial guideboard pointing two opposit ways to heaven you won't trust the sky-pilot in that sanctum any more than his priestly brother in the pulpit. BURR.

A Parting Word to Mr. Burnham.

DEAR SIR: I am glad that you hav no fault to find, in your last letter, with the amended constitution of the American Secular Union. We can now go on and "be happy yet!" As to the other matters complained of, I put in the lawyer's plea of "confession and avoidance." I did not invite speakers from a distance because we had no money to pay their expenses. Liberals who were present at the congress were invited and did speak. Yes, the secretary and treasurer were my "choice." I declined the presidency, but finally said, if you force it upon me you must giv me these officers in Philadelphia. I am not ashamed of this. It is to my methods that you object. Only two persons hav made known their objections in this regard, while scores hav written approvingly. Yes, I was at first (and at last too) displeased with some of our public speakers and papers, and said so. I was not pleased with the cut of the "flag above the cross," on our letter-heading, as I never unnecessarily offend those whom I desire to influence. But the inventor of that design served a notice on us through his lawyers that he claimed a copyright; and threatened us with a lawsuit if we continued to use it! This settled that question. Now, Mr. Burnham, "let us hav peace!" If you understood what my reasons were for the "methods" I adopted, you would commend, instead of carping. R. B. WESTBROOK.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON has a call for a course of lectures in Correctionville, Iowa. Now that he has closed his engagements in Nebraska for this year, he may be addressed for lectures and debates at Des Moines, Iowa.

THE lecture program of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association for February is as follows: February 9th, Dr. A. Wilder on "Serpent Symbols;" February 16th, Van Buren Denslow, LL.D., on "Population and Wages;" February 23d, Miss Helen H. Gardener, on "Vicarious Atonement." These lectures are followed by discussion. Lecture at 3 P.M. at Fraternity Rooms, Bedford avenue and South Second street. Twenty-third street ferry from New York.

MR. S. D. MOORE, of Adrian, Mich., now at Yipsilanti, Mich., contemplates making a trip through Kansas into Missouri, as far as Liberal, starting about March 1st, and desires to know if any Freethinking friends on the route "will open the way" for him to hav Liberal meetings with them. "I will be glad," he says, "to do all the good I can and as little harm as possible; and besides making a little acquaintance with strangers that I had never met with and getting a few names for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and by selling a few pamphlets, tracts, and books, I might in this way be a little help to others as well as in the social way they might be a help to me." Mr. Moore asks for no pay. His address is Forest Avenue Sanitarium, Yipsilanti, Mich.

IT will hardly be believed that, when sulphuric ether was first used to lessen the pains of childbirth, it was objected to as "a profane attempt to abrogate the primeval curse pronounced upon woman." . . . Why I Am NOT an Agnostic.

An Agnostic is one who is in doubt concerning the existence of a God. But, to be candid, I am compelled to say that I am no more in doubt concerning such a hypothesis than I am in doubt concerning devils, dragons, and other chimeras. An infinit good being is precisely as great an impossibility as an infinit bad being, a heaven as absolutely impossible as a hell.

I not only believe, but I know, there is no God—simply because I do not know there is one. Neither does anyone else know that there is one. No one ever has proved it, no one does now or ever can prove it. God himself—if there were one—has not proved and does not now prove it. There is absolutely no evidence, directly or indirectly; no logic, reason, sense, or analogy, to prove it.

If there were a God, I should know it, because I hav anxiously sought. But I hav sought in vain. And if the Theist insists that I should not know God, then I, in turn, insist that, for like reasons, no one else has known or now knows God. And what I cannot know, what nobody else can know and no one has ever known, is, of course, unknowable, and therefore we should not believe it.

Therefore my honest denial and fearless assertion, There is no God, is tantamount to absolute proof that there is no such being.

Upon those affirming devolves the proof. Should one say, There is a devil, it is not necessary that we should explore the world and sweep ethereal space with our telescopes in search of his satanic majesty. Oh, no; we simply say, No, there is no devil, and this denial is equivalent to proof that such a being does not exist. Those affirming must do the searching, produce the evidence, and submit it to the world, or their bald assertion falls to the ground as so much nonsense.

But the God-idea positivly conflicts with all that we know, directly or indirectly. When closely analyzed and considered in the light of modern science. it becomes a nursery tale, and the time is near at hand when millions of our best men and women will stand aghast at the thought that at one time they actually entertained the notion.

When we can prove that twice two are five; that two cannon-balls can occupy the same space at the same time; that two locomotivs can pass on the same track; that a receptacle already full can be filled again; that a finite body can be everywhere at the same time; that nothing can produce everything; that miracles are the order of the day, then, and not till then, may it be reasonably affirmed that there is a God.

Like Colonel Ingersoll, I hav subjected my belief to the full scope of free thought, the methods of science and closest reasoning. The freedom of thought and the right of expressing such thought, vouchsafed to us by the genius of our glorious republic, has led me on, even beyond Mr. Ingersoll's Agnosticism; beyond the conservativ "perhaps;" beyond the equivocating "I don't know;" beyond Spencer's "Unknowable;" beyond the compromising attitude of an unbeliever, to the more aggressiv one of an outspoken Atheist and Materialist.

An absolutely authoritativ and infallible gospel once questioned, once subjected to human tests and reason, once doubted in its minutest detail, there is no stopping-place until the goal of Atheism and Materialism is reached.

Theology is miracle. Based upon miracle, it must always remain miracle, and, consequently, must be accepted without human understanding or reason. It is emphatically non-progressiv, to-day precisely as and what it was two or four thousand years ago. It means to-day what it did then, and one word taken from or added to it destroys its authoritativ character. It is either a gospel according to Moses and the prophets, and Peter, Luke, and John, or it is simply a human affair, a fraud, a gospel according to Tom, Dick, and Harry. Until new revelations "from on high" are given to the world, all attempts to evolute religion or to substitute a "new theology" will but tend to destroy the whole.

But how many honest, thinking minds to-day remain true to the old theology and all it implies? None! It is to-day upheld only by the unthinking but honest masses, who resignedly accept it without thought or reason, and those conventional Christians who go for popularity and to please their good wives. All better and progressiv minds within the church are to-day free to confess their unbelief in many of the most important events and doctrins recorded in the Bible. The six-days creation, the personality of God, the doctrin of the fall of man, the scheme of redemption, infant and heathen damnation, a literal hell, etc., all are alike repudiated. Yet the plain language of the Bible on these things cannot be misunderstood. "And the morning and the evening were the first day," etc., proves beyond doubt that the writers of Genesis meant six literal days of twenty-four hours each, for the creation of the universe! "In the image of God created he them;" "God walking in the garden in the cool of the day;" "Moses spoke to God face to face"—all these expressions clearly indicate beyond cavil that the God of the Bible was supposed to be a person, "very like" a man. Of course "walking in the garden" clearly implies that he could not hav been anywhere else in the universe or upon the face of the earth at that particular time. In fact, he did not even occupy all the garden, or it would not hav been necessary for him to walk or to search for Adam. So much to establish the very limited personality of a God to-day still believed by millions of Christians to be the creator and ruler of an unlimited universe!

Again, the doctrins of man's fall, of total depravity, of infant and heathen damnation to an eternal and literal hell, are all recorded there as plain as the rule of three in mathematics. And all are essential to the survival of the Christian religion. If there is no hell there is no Christianity, the mission of Christ was a lamentable failure and his death worse than butchery. If man through Adam's sin is not damned, if man must not be "born again," if the heathen may be saved without Christ, would it not be infinitly preferable if all the human race died in infancy, or if all were born Hottentots and Laplanders and thus saved, than to hav them liv to see "the light of Christianity" and, perchance, for this reason be damned to eternal perdition? Would not Christ in such a case hav been and still be the cause of millions being damned, instead of being the savior of the race?

Being one of the many who by methods of reason hav discarded a blind faith in the ancient Bible, I can neither now consistently embrace the inconsistencies of the so-called "new theology" as revealed according to Beecher, Swing, Barrows, and others, finding no foothold for such a belief, but discover a correct solution for all existing problems in nature, its law and order.

Theism and Spiritism imply miracle and impossibility. These theories divest everything tangible of all potencies to do anything, then invest some imaginary nothing with supernatural powers to do everything. But we know twice two is four and cannot possibly be five. So we know that the universe fills all space and that nothing else can fill it in addition. The universe (nature) is here and there and everywhere, therefore a God cannot be here and there and everywhere. Two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time, therefore, all space being occupied by matter—solid, fluid, or aeriform—no other body, person, or thing can occupy the same space.

All objects of knowledge are natural. All we see on the earth, in the earth, over and under the earth, beyond in ethereal space, among suns, moons, planets, stars, and systems; all the revelations of our strongest lenses, reveal but natural things and causes, never a God.

All causes, powers, and agencies operating within the vast realms of nature are natural; if we can trace any effect to its cause or causes we shall always find a natural, never a supernatural cause.

The universe is eternal. It had no beginning, can never hav an end. It is infinit—having no limit, center, or circumference. Its existing now, absolutely proves that it has always existed—not, indeed, in its present form, but as an infinit aggregation of living, potent, elementary particles, combining (yes, fortuitously) in ever changing form. A beginning implies an eternity of time when it did not exist, when all was infinit vacuüm—eternal nothingness. But if this at any one time had been the actual state of space, nothing would exist now, as from nothing nothing can come. Possessing no attributes or potencies, nothing would forever remain nothing, and consequently the universe could not exist to-day.

A God postulated as existing before any imaginary "beginning," miraculously creating it from nothing, is still more absurd, as a God existing in infinit vacuity during an infinit period of time, before this imaginary beginning, who would or could not create the universe at least ten millions of years multiplied by this number ad infinitum, before the time it is said he created it, loses at once all attributes of an "omniscient" being and vanishes. Because if it was consistent with "divine wisdom" to omit the creativ act during all these ages and cycles of beginningless time, he of course would never hav consummated it, because if it was consistent with his wisdom to create it six thousand or six millions of years ago, then it must hav been very foolish to leave the creativ act undone during the eternity preceding this time, and in this case, God again loses his divine attributes.

Furthermore, I insist that it is utterly irreconcilable with reason that an eternal God, who is supposed to be perfect, omniscient, and unchangeable, who existed in infinit dark vacuity voluntarily, and of choice, during all eternity, without relations or conditions surrounding him, could hav suddenly conceived of a motiv for the creativ act never experienced or thought of before; and that after being content in absolute idleness and stagnation in his dark and cheerless abode during eternity, he should all at once so radically change in his manner and tastes as to create a universe, which would henceforth entirely change his relations, conditions, and mode of life, and to say the least, keep him pretty busy making human beings and other animals, listening to the countless prayers of the different denominations, counting hairs, permitting sparrows to fall, and at the same time whirling countless millions of planets through the immensity of space.

But, God or none, any beginning implies a miracle—a creation from nothing—which childish notion must be abandoned.

Again: God, if real, must be a person, a living organic being, otherwise he cannot be a God and all it implies. And surely the personal pronouns and appellations, "he," "his," "him," "our heavenly father" (still indulged in by Professor Swing), etc., would be anomalous if he is not a being or person of some kind. But here again we find it very difficult to retain a God. A personality implies limit, outline, form; necessitates animal organism, nervous system, digestiv and respiratory organs, and circulating processes. "What does not breathe does not liv." This postulate of science consigns God to oblivion unless he has lungs. Thought necessitates brain; sight, eyes; sound, ears; and speech, physical organs to produce it. All these processes are simply functions of living beings, in the absence of which they hav no existence in nature.

Exterminate all animal organism from the face of the earth and thought, wisdom, love, sight, etc., would vanish also. Science recognizes no manifestation of wisdom, love, etc., in inorganic matter, in air, in ethereal space, between the earth and moon or sun, simply because it is occupied only by inorganic matter and this never contains such attributes. Matter, moved by its own physical and chemical potencies, must first evolve into organic forms before any manifestations of intellect and consciousness become possible.

Therefore, if God is a thinking, living reality, he must be an organic, breathing being, or he cannot possibly be a God and all it implies.

But now the problem stares us in the face—and which the church must solve, or Atheism will soon take its place—how can an organic, limited, living God be a God and all it implies and at the same time occupy the relation of creator and ruler of an unlimited universe? How can the limited be related to the unlimited as a controling power? It is all childish talk to talk about an "infinit God" when we know of only one infinit reality and that is the universe. It is likewise absurd to talk about a God being here and there and everywhere when the universe monopolizes every point of space.

It is either all God and no universe, or it is all universe and no God.

Unless the church can intelligently solve the problem how a God with a brain can be infinit, or how a God without a brain can be a God, it will be but a few years before it will come to an ignoble end.

Therefore I am not an Agnostic. The God-idea—in spite of its hoary traditions and venerable associations—never having been duly established by logic, science, and reason, and being utterly unthinkable, and, when properly analyzed, childish and absurd, I do not put my reasonable unbelief on a par with an unreasonable belief and say "I don't know," but insist that upon those affirming devolves the proof; and unless the idea can be logically demonstrated as consistent with truth and sense, my fearless and simple denial absolutely proves and establishes the fact, startling though it be to the unthinking millions, that there is no God!

And the world will be infinitly better without one.

Rochelle, Ill., Jan. 20, 1890. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Priestcraft in the West Indies.

Since writing my last, a dispatch was received by the government of Trinidad from the home government regarding the education question. The substance of the dispatch is to repeal the education ordinance passed here in 1875, and to substitute in its place the ordinance of 1870 with amendments. The ordinance of 1875 is for the purpose of granting aid to schools attached to churches, but at the same time the priests and ministers hav full control over such schools; religious instruction is imparted to the pupils during the hours of secular instruction, and the school-teachers are paid by the priests and ministers.

The ordinance of 1870 is also in favor of granting aid to denominational schools, but the government has control instead of the priests; religious instruction is not to be given during secular instruction hours; a proviso is made to giv religious instruction before and after secular instruction hours. Any priest using any means to proselytize any of the children, government aid to the school shall immediately cease.

This is quite a serious blow to the church here and has caused a furor among religious circles, especially among the Roman Catholic priests, as they hav been known to openly preach and warn the Roman Catholics, that if any of them send their children to government secular schools, communion shall be denied them. I doubt whether the priests will stop threatening their people; if it is not done in the pulpit, it will be in the confessional.

During the month of December last the Roman Catholic archbishop of Port-of-Spain arrived from Rome with his pallium. He was met on his arrival by the bulk of the Romanists, and they marched in procession with their crosses, banners, acolytes, and of course all the paraphernalia attending the reception of a follower of the "meek and lowly Jesus." The procession marched from the dock to the cathedral. One of the local papers, describing the event, said: "All the stores of standing on both sides of the square, and up Frederick street, whether Catholic or non-Catholic, were closed as a mark of respect to his grace and the important religious character of the ovation." Has anything more absurd, more bigoted, and more fanatical been seen in the annals of any civilized country? On his arrival at the cathedral he thundered his Romish artillery from his elevated position with the following: "Outside our church there is nothing but confusion; there is no one to teach and no one to obey; everyone can form a creed for himself. . . . You, on the contrary, cannot be led astray while you listen to the voice of the authority of God established in your midst." And this is the same gentleman who a few days ago said, "There are a good many people here in this city preaching against God, but I ask you, my dear brethren, not to mind their sayings, because every man is at liberty to enjoy his own opinion." The reverend gentleman has cooled down remarkably within a few days. I suppose the stench of the pope's great toe was too much for him.

Freethought is making rapid progress around these parts, in all the islands, both French and British. It is not very long since Freethought began spreading itself here, and, as in other parts of the world, it counts among its members some of the most intelligent portions of the community.

The most laughable part in priestcraft in the West Indies is the pulpit preaching. There is open competition carried on by the ministers of the various churches. In the Roman Catholic churches preaching is mostly carried on in French, although the colony is British. French creole is spoken by almost everyone, and a great many of the nativs do not understand anything else but that language.

The sermons of these priests and ministers make one sick to listen to them. Some of their styles are quaint—the Roman Catholics generally preaching nothing else but the Virgin Mary. It is a comical sight to see the old women—they form the best part of the church-goers—mumbling their lips and counting their beads.

Now and then the priests spit out a little fire at the Liberals, but, of course, as it is usual with these classes of people, the language is not couched with any respectability. Some time since a young Roman Catholic priest, in addressing the pupils of the Roman Catholic College of the Immaculate Conception, said: "I want you to put faith in the blessed Virgin. When you are sick, pray to her and you will be cured. Pray to her to help you with your studies so that you may obtain scholarships. Keep away from bad company. By bad company I mean people who go about preaching against God." This gentleman no doubt alluded to Freethinkers when he spoke of bad company. Why are the Freethinkers bad company? Echo answers, Why?

An Irish Dominican friar recently introduced here, a few weeks ago said: "If you are out of employment pray to the Virgin and she will intercede with Jesus Christ, who will make you get work!" Has anything more stupid been ever heard in this nineteenth century? Sermons with such like sayings are preached nearly every day.

The poor people are so stupid and ignorant that anything that comes from the mouth of a priest is a fact, even if it is against common sense and reason. Another impediment that prevents the poor people from thinking otherwise is the number of educated persons who follow the church—simply because the loaves and fishes are concerned—and who are nothing more than hypocrits. The poor ignorant masses seeing these respectable people going to church think it is a grand thing to do the same, and as a consequence are led astray.

The Protestant bodies are as bigoted a class as the Roman Catholics. Recently the bishop of the Anglican church introduced a crucifix as an appendage to his altar, and lo! what a furor it created! I hav not heard how it ended, but I believe it has been quieted down by some arrangement between the distressed parties.

In my next letter I will describe to your readers the state of the greater part of our population, i.e., the East Indians, their religions, customs, manners, etc.

Our London Letter.

Freethinkers may be fairly well satisfied with the progress made during the year 1889, for although there has been no great battle and consequent hard-gained victory, the advance has been made slowly and surely. In spite of an occasional claim on the part of some obscure but struggling-for-notoriety parson that he has been the blessed means of converting some very prominent Freethought leader, the cause does not show any signs of weakness, and though searching inquiry is always made as to the defecting person, he can never be traced, and as these pious frauds are invariably exposed, those who are guilty of perpetrating them will soon get charge of their rash statement, as it can scarcely be pleasant even for a priest of the most high to be exposed to the contempt of all but the most bigoted of their personal admirers as being detected in gratuitous lying, even for the glory of God. It does not answer so well now as in the good old times of Eusebius, and fellows of his kidney.

The reports as to Mr. Bradlaugh's health are most favorable, the voyage seeming to hav quite set him on his legs again. His reception in Bombay must hav been most gratifying to his feelings. Surely no Englishman could hav met with a more hearty and welcome greeting than he has done, and he will no doubt make Indian affairs a more prominent feature in parliamentary debate than has ever been done before. His parliamentary record has certainly been a wonderful one, and it would be difficult to find another man who could hav made himself so well respected and listened to in such a manner and in so short a time. It is to be hoped he will be more careful in future, and not draw so prodigally on his reserve of strength as he has hitherto done. If he withdraws from the National Secular Society, as it is generally supposed he intends doing on his return, he will carry the best wishes of all the members with him, and he will no doubt always feel a friendly interest in the society with which he has been connected during so many years. He bore the heat and burden of the fight in its youthful days, and will only leave it now that it is in smooth water, and has no longer to struggle against tremendous odds for its very existence. I suppose it is almost a foregone conclusion as to who will carry on the presidency, and perhaps no better man can be found just now to follow Mr. Bradlaugh's footsteps than the editor of the Freethinker. He will make a good fighting leader, and is not likely to be frightened or perverted by the Christian party.

The increase both in demand and supply of novels of a Freethought tendency during the past year is a good indication of the tendency of the age. The writers of such works not being known as Freethinkers before their publication, they are read with more avidity and openness than they otherwise would be. These frequent publications hav caused much alarm in the Christian camp, and a bold champion has come forth to demolish all these teachings, in the person of that mighty warrior, Dr. Joseph Parker, of the city Temple, who is now publishing a serial tale in Great Thoughts under the title of "Curfew Jessell—The History of a Soul, or Robert Elsmere's Contrast." It opens with a prolog of a very washy nature, but evidently written in imitation of Walt Whitman, though with a considerable difference. This is followed by an introduction which is supposed to be a resumé of the story; then comes chapter one, "A Domestic Vignette," in which we are introduced to a family, the head of which is a rather peculiar individual, who possesses ample means, is a naturalist, and has a weakness for writing diaries, extracts from which are given for the reader's edification. One of them is an account of a godly rector who caught a sparrow-hawk, clipped his wings, cut his talons, fastened a cork on his beak, and then threw him amongst his brood-hens, who pecked him to death—truly a most kind and tender-hearted rector. I shall peruse this enlightening tale with interest, and wait with impatience to learn if Mr. Jessell was converted to the only true faith by the ministration of the pious rector.

The Torch Not Yet Extinguished.

The Wheeling Secular Union is now a success, hence the following resolve:

WASHINGTON COUNCIL No. 1,
PATRIOTIC SONS OF AMERICA.
WHEELING, W. VA., Dec. 18, 1889.

At the regular meeting of Washington Council No. 1, Patriotic Sons of America, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the American Secular Union, as a society, is unfit to be recognized, and that, along with any other society composed of members who are non-believers of God and the Bible, should not be allowed by our lawmakers to exist.

That the morals of the present and future generations should not be tampered with by the teachings of such societies; that this order will use every effort to obtain the names of those who hav or may join these societies, will in no manner recognize them, and will not patronize them in their business or profession, nor giv them employment.

By order of, WASHINGTON COUNCIL No. 1,
PATRIOTIC SONS OF AMERICA.

The above appearing in the Sunday morning News-Letter of December 22d, at our Union meeting on the same day we made a resolve also, which was published in the daily Register the next morning:

WHEREAS, Insomuch as the Washington Council No. 1, Patriotic Sons of America, hav exercised their hatred without provocation in denouncing the American Secular Union, of which our Union is a branch, in the exercise of a savage hatred and malice,

Resolved, That we are extremely sorry that these patriotic sons hav so far ignored the charity which the Golden Rule enjoins as to use terms against us and propose measures the like of which can only be found in the archives of the Puritan record or the Spanish Inquisition.

D. G. CROW, Pres. Wheeling Secular Union.

God's Curse.

One cold winter evening, as I was comfortably seated before a blazing fire, trying to forget the discomfort outdoors, a knock came to my door. In a minute the jovial, burly form of my friend Doctor C—— appeared in my sanctum, shaking the frozen snow off his overcoat like some big retriever dog. Having removed his wraps, and seated himself by the fireside, he, after some preliminary conversation, began telling me about a most distressing case he had just come from.

"You know," he began, "that most of my practice lies among the poorer part of the population of our city, so I was not surprised when, last evening, I received a call from a patient who was lying in the 'Traveler's Rest,' one of the lowest of our common lodging-houses in the Grassmarket. Speedily I made my way there, and, in one of the darkest corners of a most wretched room, I saw, stretched upon a shake-down, a man, or rather the mere semblance of one, who, I afterward learned, had held a high position in this, our Modern Athens.

"'Are you the doctor?' he asked, in almost a whisper, as I approached his bedside.

"I replied in the affirmativ, when he continued, 'I did not want to send for you, knowing that I was past all medical aid, but the people of the house desired it—I suppose, to save them the trouble of a coroner's unwelcome visit. But since you are here I should like to tell you my tale—I will be dead ere morning—a curious tale, from which, since you are a doctor, you may draw a moral that may prove of some benefit to the people.' Here a fit of coughing intervened, so violent that it seemed to rend his frame in twain.

"His disease was simply alcholism—a frame weakened by excessiv drinking and insufficient food to such an extent that recovery seemed impossible.

"Having recovered himself from his fit of coughing, he turned his large, dark eyes upon me and said, 'Doctor, do you believe in heredity?'

"As I had never given the subject much thought, I simply replied, 'Sometimes.'

"'I do,' returned he almost savagely, 'and that the vices of our parents more often descend to us than their virtues. Why, I cannot say, only that vice is a most infectious disease. At least, it was proved so in my case, for all that my father bequeathed me was an inordinate desire for liquor. Nor could that desire be satiated. I prayed and struggled and fought against the black demon without avail. My prayer was unheard, or if heard, the comedy was too good, too pleasing to that loving God to end so soon. Yet, I ought to hav known that one might as well hav cried to the purring wind as to hav addressed his supplications to that almighty fiend. But I was a Christian then and thought God was the loving father the priests described him to be. How easily men are gulled!

"'Then in my misery, I came to the conclusion that God could not exist, else he could not be so cruel as to punish me in such a manner for the fancied slight put upon his name by some of my ancestors. Why should I be punished for my father's sins? Is it only to satiefy an innate fiendishness in the almighty's nature? If so, he is the devil masquerading in the good God's robes. Can there be any love in the nature of a God who damns the better portion of his children to eternal torment only to enjoy their agony? O God of stone! I hav worn my knees in prayer, I hav pleaded, and rent the air with my cries for help, all in vain. He cared not nor answered.

"'O beneficent father, divest thyself of thy sheep's clothing and appear to the world in thy true form. I hav said enough. Speaking hurts me. But I detest that God who, though he could, would not save me.' He sank back on his pillow exhausted. I watched by him until early this morning, when, about three o'clock, he opened his eyes, which shone with an unwonted brilliancy. I saw at once by his appearance that it was merely a question of minutes.

"'Good-bye, doctor,' he said in a low whisper, and as I shook his hand a smile came over his face as he said, 'Don't-let-God-f-o-ol-you.' He closed his eyes again, sighing wearily, as the shadow of the angel's wings passed over him and this poor half-maddened soul crept unto the great unknown."

Such was the doctor's tale. The tale of a life wrecked amidst the breakers of dissipation, of a madman, dying, yet breathing his defiance at the supposed author of his misery.

OUR readers will be exceedingly glad to note that the leader in the Symposium begun in this issue is the proper person to take that position—COLONEL ROBERT G. INGERSOLL. His replies to the questions asked will not be read last nor without great satisfaction by the Liberals of the country.

The contributors to the Symposium next week will be S. P. Putnam, F. M. Holland, Lucy Colman, Parker Pillsbury, Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, C. B. Reynolds, J. H. Burnham, W. F. Jamieson, Charles Watts, and John Peck. In the succeeding issue Mr. Thaddeus B. Wakeman will contribute a review of the others, and set forth his conception of the genius of Freethought.

The Pictures.

We are inclined to think that the Lord was the one responsible for the reduction in the number of new subscribers received last week, his antagonism being displayed in the snow blockades throughout the western part of the country. The mails hav been arriving in this city with more regularity during the past seven days, and hav brought us fifty-nine new subscribers on the picture account, making a total of two hundred and sixty-eight, besides donations as follows:

M. S. Hayhurst	$ 50	Ike Klein	25
V. Dronsutowicz	1 75	Thos. Mathews	1 00
G. A. Vogle	75	Joel Hayes	1 00
T. D. Lambert	1 00	J. H. Steward	75
S. L. Hogan	50	Enoch Wickershaw	75
C. M. Waldron	25	E. Marshall	75
E. P. Whitford	5 00	Mrs. S. D. Francis	1 00

Making $140.65 in all. The number of new subscribers is very encouraging, and we send most hearty and sincere thanks to all who hav interested themselvs to aid us in this way and by making donations. In addition, we can only repeat what was said last week, that we wish all our friends would speak a good word for the paper, if convenient, and hand a copy of it to some Liberal friend who may be a possible subscriber. To induce those to whom the paper may be given for this purpose to subscribe, we repeat the offer of "Try Square" as a premium, namely: Copies of the book to be given as premiums to, or for, new subscribers who pay the regular price of $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, before March 11th. One copy of the book to be given to every volunteer new subscriber, and one to every old subscriber who procures a new one at the regular price of $3. The price of the book by itself is $1.

By calling the attention of possible subscribers to the foregoing offer, perhaps their action may be hastened.

Mr. Crafts Declines to Debate.

With the consent of Mr. Remsburg we a few weeks ago challenged the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, the activ man of the American Sabbath Union, to a discussion with Mr. Remsburg of the issues raised by the Blair Sunday bill, offering the use of THE TRUTH SEEKER columns or to arrange for an oral debate. But Mr. Crafts is wise now beyond the wisdom possessed when he accepted the challenge of the Seventh Day Adventist representativs and subsequently backed out, and he will not meet Mr. Remsburg in any shape. He writes:

"N. Y., '1, 25, '90.

"E. M. MACDONALD: A great pressure of work has prevented earlier answer to your letter, and will prevent acceptance of your offer to debate in your columns or elsewhere through the party you name. Yours,

"WILBUR F. CRAFTS."

We are sorry Mr. Crafts has not more time at his command, and that his work presses him so. We frankly confess that the annihilation of Mr. Crafts and his party, biblically, logically, reasonably, historically, and in all other ways, by Mr. Remsburg, would hav been calmly gazed upon by us, and the pieces swept out with intense satisfaction.

Presbyterianism Getting Soft-Hearted.

The New York Presbytery has added its vote to the demand for a revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith. About fifty Presbyteries hav now voted on it, of which nearly thirty-five favor revision.

The points desired by the revisers to be eliminated, or materially modified, are five in number, as follows:

"Reprobation.
"The damnation of infants.
"The damnation of the heathen.
"The classification of Roman Catholics as idolators.
"The statement that the pope is Antichrist."

The doctrin of election and reprobation, that is, that some are elected by God to glory and the rest reprobated to eternal punishment, is taught in the third chapter of the Confession in these words:

"By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death.

"These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definit that it cannot be either increased or diminished.

"The rest of mankind [the non-elect] God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice."

The damnation of non-elect infants and the heathen who hav never truly come to Christ, is foreshadowed in these paragraphs of chapter ten of the Confession:

"Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the spirit, who worketh when, and where, and how he pleaseth. So, also, are all other elect persons, who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word.

"Others, not elected, although they may be called by the ministry of the word, and may hav some common operations of the spirit, yet they never truly come unto Christ, and, therefore, cannot be saved. Much less can men not professing the Christian religion be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature and the law of that religion they do profess; and to assert and maintain that they may is very pernicious and to be detested."

The classification of Roman Catholics as idolators is in chapter twenty-nine of the Confession. Section VI says:

"That doctrin which maintains a change of the substance of bread and wine, into the substance of Christ's body and blood (commonly called transubstantiation) by consecration of a priest, or by any other way, is repugnant, not to scripture alone, but even to common sense and reason; overthroweth the nature of the sacrament; and hath been, and is the cause of manifold superstitions, yea, of gross idolatries."

The reproach of the pope as Antichrist is found in chapter twenty-five section VI:

"There is no other head of the church but the Lord Jesus Christ. Nor can the pope of Rome, in any sense be heard thereof; but is that Antichrist, that man of sin, and son of perdition, that exalteth himself in the church, against Christ, and all that is called God."

The debate on these points, particularly on those concerning reprobation and infant and heathen damnation, has waxed high and hot. One of the most earnest of the revisers, Dr. Briggs, asked his brethren these questions:

"It is said that we are cutting out the heart of Calvinism. What is the heart of Calvinism? These things that we are to cut out are warts on the skin of Calvinism; they are the parings of the nails that every biblical and classical student was done with long ago. Remove them and the church will be as Calvinistic as ever.

"Dr. Hall says that the Thirty-nine Articles of the English church are Calvinistic. So they are, but those Thirty-nine Articles do not contain one of the five things that we propose to cut out of our Confession. If the Thirty-nine Articles are Calvinistic without them, why will our Confession not remain Calvinistic after they are removed?

"What we wish to do is to prevent these gentlemen who represent but a school of Calvinism, who are but scholastic and speculativ Calvinists, from holding the whip over others who do not believe in their theories. We are going to keep historical Calvinism, and we are opposed to the tyranny of scholastic Calvinism.

"The declaration of the doctrin of the damnation of infants and the heathen was distinctly made and upheld time and again by the Westminster divines who made this Confession. It was upheld all through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. There is no use in saying now that the Confession doesn't mean what it was meant to mean. The fact is that the church has come over to the view of Keith the Quaker, and has abandoned the old view of the damnation of infants and the heathen. The thing to do is to change the Confession, not to attempt to falsify it or to get around it by quibbles like that once used by a predecessor of Dr. Patton at Princeton, 'Perhaps God never allows any but elect infants to die in infancy.'"

Another minister, a Mr. Smith, of Cleveland, spoke for revision, because with damned infants and damned heathen in the Confession he couldn't answer Colonel Ingersoll. In his home city one Sunday evening he found his congregation much smaller than usual, and knew it was on account of a lecture being given in the Opera House by Colonel Ingersoll. After his own service ended he went to the Opera House, and found it packed to the roof with people who had paid $1.50 a head to hear a "most blasphemous tirade against the Bible." He added:

"While I was there the speaker pulled out a copy of the Confession, and for forty minutes he spoke against the doctrin of reprobation as there set out, and I hav to acknowledge that the arguments that he advanced in his racy and attractiv way were unanswerable by me. I know that many young men who were there that night were confirmed in their skepticism by the use in that way that night of the doctrin that we are now trying to get out of the Confession. In opposition to the harm that it has done, what good has it ever done? You say that Calvinism has done so much for the world, and it is true, but has our Calvinism with reprobation in it ever done anything more than the Calvinism of our Dutch brethren with reprobation out? I confess that I cannot separate reprobation from God's sovereignty and general election, but it is not necessary for us to go further than the synod of Dort dared to go, further than the English church dared to go, further than any body of Calvinists has dared to go, except the body that formed the Westminster Confession."

The Rev. Dr. Page followed Mr. White, and deprecated the confession that any good Presbyterian had found the Colonel's arguments unanswerable. He said: "I hav no doubt that if Mr. Ingersoll had his way he would revise the confession, and I'm not altogether certain that Ingersoll has not had more than any other influence to do with bringing about this agitation over the question of revision." This was pretty strong language for the clergymen to listen to, and cries of "No!" "Take that back!" "You don't mean that!" arose all over the church, and it was several moments before the speaker could proceed. He said:

"There is nothing personal in this so far as I am concerned. There are many on my side of whom I cordially disapprove, and there is nobody on the other side, Bob Ingersoll excepted, for whom I hav not the highest regard. This scheme of revision is only temporary. If we consent to it they will use it as a basis for further revision. Why, if we should revise it down to the Apostles' Creed I know some men in this presbytery who would want to revise that; they would say, 'I believe in the resurrection of the dead,' and would want to cut out the rest. There would be no objection to mere changes in form and language, and nothing more was proposed at first, but so much besides has been developed by this debate that I think it foreshadows a division in the church. This is not the age in which to attempt to revise the doctrins of a church. Why, Calvin could hav swallowed a thousand of the theologians of to-day and not hav suffered from indigestion. The nineteenth century has already brought a revision of the Bible, and in my opinion that has proved to be but a mass of nonsense. If the new creed of the English Presbyterian church is a specimen of the work of to-day, good Lord, deliver us! While German Rationalism, English skepticism, French Communism, Russian Nihilism, and Bob Ingersoll, with Anarchism generally, are demanding a revision of the confession, it is no time for us to interfere with the old doctrins. We must wait for other days and other men for such a great work."

The vote for revision was ninety-three to forty-three, and included all these points, though the desirability of the elimination of the allegations against the pope and the Catholics was stated in the form of suggestion rather than demand. On the same day the Chicago Presbytery voted for some sort of revision, not specifically stated. There is no doubt that the next General Assembly will be compelled to do something with the Confession to bring it more nearly in harmony with humane instincts. To bring it into harmony with common sense is impossible unless it be abolished.

From Kingston to Costa Rica, and to Anarchy.

The people up in Kingston, N. Y., are experiencing the blessings of the "good Lord, good devil" policy of managing their public schools. In one of the school districts of that city a bitter fight is being waged between the Protestants and the Catholics, which came about in this way: The district is the largest and wealthiest in the city. Within its limits are St. Mary's Roman Catholic church, rectory, and other parish buildings. For twenty years or more the Catholics controled the school. Two years ago there was a general uprising against the way the school was being managed. It was charged that the principal was incompetent. Many of the more liberal Catholics sided with the Protestants. The principal was ousted, and a Protestant selected in his stead. Since the Protestant assumed control the school has prospered. At times the attendance has been so large that there was not sufficient accommodation for the pupils. It became necessary to hire a branch school. A contract was yearly entered into with the priest of St. Mary's church for the teaching of the extra pupils at the Franciscan brothers' school, which is taught on sectarian principles. Of late there has been strong opposition to this and demand for the erection of an addition to the main school building. Last spring, after a bitter contest at the polls, a board of trustees in favor of reform was elected. The three trustees are Catholics, but believe in public schools being non-sectarian, and that parish schools should not be continued at public expense. In August a spirited meeting was held to consider the advisability of building an addition and doing away with the branch school. The Catholics secured a victory by voting to postpone action. Several hundred people gathered at the school-house one night last week, and many bitter statements were made. The Protestants and dissatisfied Catholics will appeal to the state superintendent of public instruction, who has been apprised of the condition of affairs. The matter will in all probability enter the courts. It is said to-night that the Franciscan brothers' school will not be rented again by the trustees.

There is no use of beating around the stump in this school question. There is bound to be trouble until the matter is settled once for all, and rightly settled. The state must maintain sufficient schools to educate the children, and it must suffer no religion at all to be taught therein.

We are quite well aware that the individualistic philosophers will declaim against taxing one man to educate another man's child; but they must bear in mind that the millennium is not yet here, and that all things cannot now be made absolutely right. The nearest we can get to it is to do as little injustice as possible, and as the state is necessary, and as its integrity and liberality depends upon the enlightenment and education of its individual members, public schools are imperativly needed, and must be sustained. Liberty and enlightenment go together; neither is a follower; they are companions. Liberate a people and they become enlightened; enlighten a people and they work out their own liberation. Liberty is the greatest of all human needs; to maintain it the public schools are almost indispensable; quite indispensable for a democratic people with a republican form of government.

Wherever the Catholic church can, it is found to destroy these schools, and her object is to destroy with them that liberty which we now enjoy, by training the young to submit to be serfs. It is a far cry from Kingston to Costa Rica, but in both places, and all the way between, the church is the same. A dispatch from San José tells us that the same war is going on in Costa Rica as in Kingston. The bishop of the diocese just six weeks ago preached a sermon to a cathedral full of people in which he told the people not to send their children to the public schools, because the teachers were foreigners and Protestants. If the charge were true that the schools do teach Protestantism, the bishop had cause of complaint. But from the reply of the secretary of state of Costa Rica, who has charge of religious and educational matters as well, it is evident that the bishop's sermon was inspired by hatred of any education for the children which does not also train them to be servants of the church. The secretary says to the bishop:

"Our educational law decisivly forbids the teachers to attack in any way the religious convictions of the families whose children are confided to their care, and thus far this wise, fundamental principle has been carefully observed. The state gives no religious instruction, for it comprehends that this is a matter to be left to the family, or to those organizations whose purpose is to maintain and diffuse religious creeds, and which organizations should be able to fulfill their functions freely here, as is done in other countries. But the same principle which serves as political basis in this particular, which is none other than a respect for the liberty of conscience, is at the same time the most powerful guarantee of religious neutrality in schools and colleges. This attitude should suffice for the Catholic church, since in order to express dissatisfaction, it must claim that upon the laity devolves the duty of imparting religious instruction, which in reality is its own.

"Convinced, therefore, as is the government, that in none of its branches has it attacked the church, nothing is more natural than that it exact from the latter the same conduct in respect to the state's educational institutions; and still greater reason has it for not consenting that an adverse propaganda be uttered upon false data."

Costa Rica is a Catholic country, and that such schools hav been found necessary is a national concession that the position of the Freethinker is right. Let the United States take no back step; giv us sufficient schools to educate all the children who seek their doors, but giv us no religion nor anti-religion, but plain, straightforward teaching of those branches of knowledge which are necessary to enable the children to comprehend our form of government and to earn a livelihood which shall keep them out of prison. The parochial schools furnish altogether too many criminals, and the Catholic's last ground of complaint at being taxed to support public schools while sending his own children to the papist school would be removed if his school tax were placed with the fund to maintain state prisons.

Concerning the action of the Milwaukee school authorities in expurgating the Readers used in the schools of that city, Fair Play says: "But just think how this Secularizing work must interest the God-in-the-Constitution people! And what shall we say of the books as they were and as they are? As they were parents who hated the theology were compelled to help support the schools in which they were used; as they are, parents who think that the omission of the theology involves a serious loss are compelled to support the schools in which the books are not used. In both cases, injustice. Are either the Theocrats or Secularists in the pathway of equity? No."

Mr. B. R. Tucker quotes from Waterman's Journal a sentence which applies to this statement by his fellow-Anarchist as well as to the obtundent Mr. Carus, whom Mr. Tucker belabors. The Journal says: "The startling depth of ignorance displayed in this turns one giddy as he gazes into the bottomless abyss of confusion that yawns before him." The facts are that the people of the country hav consented —openly and affirmativly, or silently by acquiescence —to voluntarily coöperate (we believe that to be a good Anarchistic phrase) in the education of their children in the simpler branches of learning which everyone agrees are indispensable to the welfare of the children. At any rate, all parents are agreed (and even individualistic philosophers admit the right of parents over young and helpless children)— all of them—to teach their offspring such things as reading, writing, arithmetic, and a few other studies, and they voluntarily coöperate—I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word—by establishing public schools. Then along comes a Christian, a lot of them, who say to each other, "Why not make the teacher also train our children in our religious ideas? It will save us trouble, and our children must be taught these ideas some way." So, being in the majority, and the teacher being nothing loth, they add religion to the curriculum adopted by the voluntary coöperators. This, of course, is an infringement of the rights of the others; a piece of majority despotism. But by and by the voluntary coöperators win over to their side, by argument and persuasion, enough of the despots to help them rid themselvs of these riders of the fanatics, and they throw off the excrescence and return to their first plan upon which all are agreed. Is there any inequity in that? Are the rights of any invaded? Surely not. They might and would be if the objectors to religious teaching turned about and taught irreligion, but this they do not do. The inequity in the matter is when the children are taught something to which their parents object. But no one objects to the simple branches of secular knowledge. Even Catholics admit their use and necessity. The Milwaukee board, then, hav, so far as they hav gone, but replaced inequity with equity.

The only valid point which the Anarchists, or, as perhaps they prefer to be called, the Individualists, hav made against our school system is that it is unfair to tax one man to educate another man's child. It is, they affirm, an injustice to force the Catholic to pay a school tax when he is supporting a parochial school in which his child is receiving what, in his ignorance, he thinks is a sufficient education. From the standpoint of rigid individualism the objection is unanswerable. But the individualist should remember that the world is imperfect, that nearly all people sometimes need a policeman, that government is an absolute necessity. The Jeffersonian principle—and that is the American principle—is to hav as little government as possible, but some we must hav. The consent of the governed is the base of republicanism. Now, in order to do away with the patriarchal government of Jehovah, as formed by his self-elected apostles, and the despotism of a czar ruling an ignorant and brutal race, the children must be educated. Ignorant people compel stern rule to keep them from murdering and robbing each other. In regard to the Catholics, the objection to forcing them to pay school tax may be somewhat cavalierly, but justly, dismissed as we hav before intimated by transferring their school money to the fund for maintaining reformatories and state prisons, so that they will get its full benefit. With others, it may be said that compulsory education and its support is directly tending to reduce to a minimum the amount of government necessary. What they lose in school tax is made up by reducing taxes for other purposes—such as poor farms, etc. So, on the whole, admitting that government is a necessity—and no sane person will deny this—schools for the teaching of secular knowledge may be maintained without impairing the pecuniary rights of any individual. At first blush, it may seem apparent that Mr. Walker is under no sort of obligation to educate Mr. Jones's boy; but he will find it cheaper in the long run to do it, otherwise he might find it necessary to board him in some poorhouse—though, of course, he will quickly deny that there exists any logical reason why he should help support a poorhouse. But theory in this matter is one thing; facts are another, and facts hav the better of the argument. As Colonel Ingersoll once said about the tariff discussion—the freetraders hav all the arguments and the protectionists all the facts; so it is with the individualists and the supporters of government.

But these metaphysical distinctions can be well deferred till the Catholics and Protestants are made aware that the people belonging to neither sect hav rights as well as themselvs.

The Canadians and the "Age of Reason."

This from the Montreal Star explains itself:

"Some time ago the importation into Canada of Paine's 'Age of Reason' was forbidden, and copies were seized at Toronto and Montreal. A suit was entered against the collector of the port of Montreal, but was lost on a technicality. The Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club determined to test the question, whether this work could be placed under the ban as 'immoral and obscene,' and they hav lately imported a number of copies from the United States, which were entered at the custom house, and duty paid on them without comment from the officials. It appears that the censorship has been relaxed."

The Canadian Secular Union, through its president, Robert C. Adams, now proposes to learn how the custom officials at Toronto regard the "Age of Reason." If they class it among the "immoral and obscene" works published by certain Christians who would sell their Lord himself for a few dollars, then President Adams will be heard from.

The Canadian custom officials hav in the past shown themselvs to be queerly constructed mentally. Not only hav they confiscated Paine's "Age of Reason" as an immoral book, but they hav been absurd enough to confiscate Colonel Ingersoll's writings on the same grossly libelous charge. And a postmaster up there a few months ago destroyed THE TRUTH SEEKERS addressed to a subscriber. We were collecting evidence against the scoundrelly official, when the sudden death of the subscriber rendered it useless. The customs officers seem to be constituted judge, jury, and executioner by the Canadian law, and with their Middle Age religious bigotry can condemn anything opposed to Christianity as immoral. It is high time that the law was changed.

Letters from Friends.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you $2 to "help continue the pictures." Hoping that success may crown the effort, I am,

Yours in unbelief, F. S. GANTER.

BARTLETT, DAK., Jan. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find $3.25 for one year's renewal to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL. Continue the pictures. Very truly yours, E. SMITH.

GREENSBURG, PA., Jan. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send money for renewal, a new subscriber, and three ANNUALS. I vote in favor of pictures and John Peck and the Truth Seeker Company forever, amen. Let us pray. JOHN S. BYERS.

DETROIT, MICH., Jan. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4—$3 for renewal, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, and seventy-five cents toward the support of the cartoons. I will try and send you some new subscribers. Respectfully yours, E. CHOPE.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., Jan. 4, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for one new subscriber, a thorough Infidel, one who has come to stay, and votes for both pictures. I think that I can get some more. I sent on December 23d for ANNUALS, fifty cents.

R. L. TITUS.

NORTH BALTIMORE, O., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $9.84 for books, to help out on the picture question, hoping it will be as good as a few new subscribers, who are hard to get in this God's country. By all means keep Heston at work. S. M. BOWER.

HIGHLANDS, N. J., Jan. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The ANNUAL came to hand in good condition, and I am very much pleased with it. I will come to the city the last of this month and will call at the office, and giv the money for the pictures, if they are going to be continued, which I hope they will. WM. L. JOHNSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER first-rate. It is a good eye-opener for Christians. Heston's cartoons are just splendid. I hope you will continue them as heretofore. I will try and get you subscribers among my friends.

Yours respectfully, WM. THOMPSON.

OVERBROOK, KAN., Jan. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav tried to get new subscribers, but the times are hard. In regard to the pictures, they are all right. Keep them up. You are not publishing a paper to suit the orthodox or Roman Catholics. If the pictures hurt their feelings, why, that is the design of the artist, I suppose.

H. W. COLE.

SOAPPOOSE, ORE., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I think you should continue the pictures. They attract attention to foolish and immoral and improbable and ridiculous passages of the Holy Queer. There is no weapon as strong as ridicule. Inclosed find money for the ANNUAL and books according to subjoined list.

Yours, W. W. WEST.

GILBERT, IND., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to send my vote in favor of the illustrations in the shape of a new subscriber or two, but it cannot be done in this Christ-cursed community. I sincerely hope, however, that the illustrations will be sustained—even if it does bring me in the range of Brother Parton's shot.

Very truly yours, R. C. ALLEN.

WARRENSBURG, MO., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not been able to get any additional subscription; hav not been able to try much, for I cannot get about on account of my health. The cartoons I like very much. I think them good object-lessons, and doing good. I herewith send you a list of names for sample copies, as you request. Yours for the truth, O. D. WILLIAMS.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please place the inclosed $1 to my credit. No one is more anxious to forward the paper than myself, but these people are so stupid. However, I keep the papers in circulation, and may hav done good without my knowing of it. I generally place them on our counter picture up; any person can hav them, and they never remain long.

COLIN MCLARTY.

ALEXANDRIA, ONT., Dec. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $4—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, and the balance for the pictures, which I hope will be continued on both sides. I hav lost many books through the mail, which I suppose were confiscated by our Canadian bigots in custom houses or post-offices. CHAS. LAPERCHE.

ROCKY RIVER, O., Jan. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As an old man, I must say the illustrations of the Hebrew scriptures in THE TRUTH SEEKER are "pointers" as to the Christian religion as I read it. The phantom Jesus Christ is the most colossal of all swindles; and the most dangerous to illustrate in burlesque, as you know financial ruin and wreck of the office over your head would result from illustrations of New Testament characters inside of one year. Oh, gentle and sweet and forgiving is the spirit of the saintly, now as in the past. Don't tempt them.

SILAS GLEASON.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., Jan. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I renew my subscription and send twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. As to the illustrations, I think those upon the first page are good in sentiment and point, but think those upon the last page are coarse and not calculated to help our cause except in rare cases. As to new subscribers, I wish I could send some, but cannot get them here. H. F. YOUNG.

WAYLAND, MICH., Jan. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry that I cannot get a new subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER in this place. Some are too poor, and some hold too fast on the almighty dollar. Pictures or no pictures, you can count in me as a subscriber. Inclosed please find $1; send me two copies of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and other books as follows.

Yours, JOSEPH WENZEL.

TYNGSBORO, MASS., Jan. 12, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I think Heston's front-page pictures are usually good, some very good. Their worst fault is the coarseness of the engraving. The Bible portraits are pretty rough. If they could be toned down to decency they would better befit the dignity of a sensible paper. If the Bible is as vile as averred by its assailants, why should they portray it? JOHN P. GUILD.

OLIVE, CAL., Jan. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for two subscribers for the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER. I hav succeeded in getting a new subscriber. I may get you one or more subscribers yet. I was anxious to hav you get them in order to keep up the pictures, which I think are not to be dispensed with, as I know there are many that look at the pictures that would not touch the paper otherwise, and then will read more or less. I lend mine out. J. G. SHORMAKER.

YUMA, COL., Jan. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3.25 for my subscription and the ANNUAL. I hav the promis of one new subscriber and the half promis of several more. It would be my wish to hav the pictures continued. Heston's pictures don't "shock" me half so much as the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis and dozens of other chapters in the "blessed Bible." When the Holy Queer passes out of existence then we can retire Heston on full pay, and all will be well. LYMAN W. LELAND.

RAVENNA, MICH., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: My subscription is in advance for quite a while yet, but as I want the paper illustrated, I will send you a little help, and new subscribers also if I can. I feel that this religious question is one of the greatest now before the world. It will take hard fighting to down it. Inclosed please find $2, for which I wish you to send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS for 1889 and 1890, and the balance use for the picture fund. JAMES F. TIBBITS.

LURAY, VA., Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to tell you what I think of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best paper I ever saw. I hope it will do much good. I wish the hypocrits would all read it. I hope you will be able to continue the pictures. I will send you some postage stamps; please send me extra copies. I will try to get a new subscriber. I will do my best. Tell Mr. John Peck to strike them heavy—that it takes heavy blows to hav any effect. G. D. DADISMAN.

CLARKSVILLE, IA., Jan. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Send me the ANNUAL. I shall vote for the pictures. They are great object-lessons, not only to Liberals, but to the great army of non-combatants. It must not be thought the victory will be won by throwing cotton balls, nor need it be expected that the change sought to be effected will be a painless one. If the pictures disturb the equanimity of the Christian, so much the better. It ought to be done. E. FOWLE.

MOUNT PLEASANT, PA., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER for January 4th failed to reach me, reasons unknown; unless, perhaps, it may be that the Holy John Wanamaker, or some of his Christian cronies in postal offices, interrupted its progress hither. All I know is that it has not arrived, and I miss it sorely, for it propounds things which are in accord with my sentiments of right and justice. And the pictures are excellent illustrations of the texts chosen. JAMES RODGERS.

FAIRBURY, NEB., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been trying to get new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but hav not succeeded. I think this town one of the worst priest-ridden of any in the United States. I like the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER first-rate. I hope to see them continued. Inclosed please find $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, ten cents for hooks for the TRUTH SEEKER Binder, twenty-five cents for the "Bible Inquirer," balance for cartoons.

Respectfully, BEN TURNER.

MINNESOTA LAKE, MINN., Dec. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed money for subscription and the ANNUAL. I am trying to get you new subscribers. I want to see the pictures. I learn a good deal from the paper. Do not be discouraged; your paper is the best which I read, and I cannot get along without it. On October 24th we lost a true Liberal, my brother, Dr. Glick, at Omaha, Neb. He practiced medicin there. He is gone, after suffering many years with pains in his stomach, which came from life in Siberia. He was a good man in his profession; he helped the poor all that was in his power, and gave them medicin free. He was free from superstition, and he was against all tyrannical power. He was afraid of no king, church, priest, czar, devil, or God, as long as he tried to do what was right to mankind. E. S. GLICK.

CREAMERY, MONT., Jan. 5, 1890

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. It would, I think, help Freethought, also your paper, to at least do away with the pictures on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am fond of arguments, and hav many with my Christian friends. Were it not for those coarse pictures your paper would furnish us with many a text, but as it is, I do not care to show it to folks. Personally I hav no objection, but owing to the illustrations the paper fails in its purpose, its usefulness. I am, sir, Respectfully, F. LATUS.

YANKTON, S. D., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav tried to get some new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but am unable to do so, and am not able to giv anything to maintain the illustrations of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will be satisfied either way. I take the paper because I like it; and you are the one to decide in the matter. I would like to help if I could. I hav found by reading your paper that some of the Liberal element are very egotistical and dogmatic. But I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, and especially Peck and Ingersoll. I inclose sum for renewals, ANNUALS, and books according to list.

W. H. WERDEBANGE.

OTO, IA., Jan. 7, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.50, for which please fill the inclosed list of orders. A word about those pictures. I cannot speak for the people of the East, but they just suit the West. So I cast my vote for the pictures. I am afraid we soon will hav to do without them, as Heston's health is very poor, his friends and relativs tell me. I wish to say a word to the friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER. In renewing your subscription send for some book or books. I hav done so for several years. I do not see how any good Liberal can do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav taken it ever since it started in Illinois, and expect to as long as I can read.

Yours as ever, S. R. DAY.

SEATTLE, WASH., Jan. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. Your appeal to the Liberals some time ago to secure each one a new subscriber in order to maintain the illustrations, is heartily indorsed as far as the spreading of Liberal literature is concerned, but as to the pictures I hav some doubt as to whether they are a benefit to your esteemed paper or not. Mr. Heston no doubt manifests great skill in drawing satirical scenes; but in drawing sublime and solemn scenes, like the victory of science and Freethought over superstition and ignorance, the caricatures of these personalities are simply ridiculous.

WM. RADLOFF.

PARSONS, KAN., Jan. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: With due respect for honest opinion, I fully indorse the noble sentiments of Ella E. Gibson, Barre, Mass. The cartoons must be continued. Discontinuance is a retreat. Retreat means truckling, cowardice, great loss and little gain. Cartoons giv through the eye vivid conceptions which the deluded, prejudiced brain is often unable otherwise to grasp. They attract attention by exciting a sense of the ridiculous in its true light. Curiosity is aroused. A turning of the leaves, a little reading, and investigation follows in their train. Doubt follows investigation; and when this sets in the delusion is gone. I worked two long years for four subscriptions. I can renew them in the spring with eight or ten more. M. WILLINGTON.

PORTLAND, ORE., Jan. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I notice there are some people against the cartoons, but, I am glad, only very few, and I hope these few will change their minds soon. Cannot anyone read a good deal out of those pictures? I say, yes, he can. By those pictures most readers hav learned a good deal more than from any other Liberal paper without the pictures. Mr. F. Lessmann gathered six more subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER on account of the pictures. I know you would not hav near as many subscribers out where I hav been but for them. They told me they keep THE TRUTH SEEKER on account of the pictures. That is the reason they like it better than any other Liberal paper. I will try my best to get subscribers. Keep on with the pictures.

Yours truly, W. WEDEKEN.

OXANNA, ALA., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Here is $5—$3 for my renewal, fifty cents for ANNUALS for last year and 1890, and the remaining $1.50 for the pictures. If the $1.50 is not the equivalent of a new subscriber, I will giv more if needed, if the pictures are continued, which I certainly hope will be done. All the criticisms against the pictures that I hav seen up to date are disgustingly silly, viewed from my standpoint. It is a terrible thing to wound the tender feelings of a class of people who belong to organizations that hav murdered millions of their fellow-creatures for difference of opinion, and who are striving to regain the power to do the same thing again.

I could not get a subscriber in this part of our benighted country, but am willing to contribute money to keep the glorious TRUTH SEEKER up to its present standard of excellence.

Very truly yours, GEO. GEER.

PUEBLO, COL., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to the friend whose address I inclose, also send him and me each the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890. Brother John Peck talks of the weak-kneed Liberals. There are such people, I know. I like them. They are on the edge of discovery. Let us be patient with them. They are just emerging from the clouds of superstition. When the degradation of superstition is pounded into us when young we cannot shake it off at once. But now I hav fully crossed the silly and foolish country of superstition and hav landed on good soil. Therefore I like John Peck. I like the pictures of Heston's. And I will say, as Brother Peck says, let each and all strike as hard a blow as he can in his own way. When I see Christians, I strike right and left with both fists. Sometimes I knock them down, with Ingersoll in one hand and John Peck in the other, and when I do not see them handy I grab hold of some other good Freethinker and hit them a blow with him. I want all the workers to keep steadily on, no matter what discouragement they may see at times. I intend to keep pounding until the last day in the afternoon.

JAMES R. DE GOLLEY.

LURAY, VA., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed money order of $5 for the valuable TRUTH SEEKER for two years, and twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. When I first noticed something said about voting on the pictures, I thought I could find plenty of objections to them. But since I hav been looking over the papers and thinking about the matter I must acknowledge that I hav become in favor of them. Christians here generally get disgusted at them at first sight. Why can they not as well be disgusted at the Bible as at a true picture of it? Simply because they do not read it. Then if we present the pictures to them and insist on their reading and comparing them with the Bible, we hav a fair show to get their eyes open a little anyway. Therefore I must vote for the pictures to continue. I am sorry to tell you that people here are too superstitious to encourage a paper of Freethought and reform, therefore I cannot get any new subscribers, but thought that a two years' subscription for myself might be about the same to you as one new one.

M. V. DADISMAN.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IA., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I hand you the price of the ANNUAL for 1890. I would not like to hav the pictures discontinued. Twice during the past few months they were omitted for a single issue on account of sickness of Mr. Heston, I believe. I missed them much for a single issue. The space they occupy is well filled. They are important. It seems to me that the person who finds them repulsiv and considers them blasphemy, is the kind to send for a "sky-pilot" when he thinks his time is short to liv. The shock to Christians at sight of them cannot be harder for them to stand than the pictures they present of eternal punishment for all who do not believe as they do. I will pledge another subscriber within sixty days if the pictures are continued; even, if necessary, will take a second copy myself, and hav one to giv away. I see the suggestion offered, that all the past illustrations be put in book form to help the work along. I will take three copies as soon as issued if this be done. Make it complete to 1890, and then a new volume every year.

Yours very truly, H. J. BLINN.

KENT, O., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I highly prize the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and read it with unabated interest. I hope to meet its weekly greetings the rest of my life, as I hav now passed my seventy-third milestone.

I wish to place myself on record as fully indorsing the course pursued by the late congress of the American Secular Union, notwithstanding Brother Burnham's harsh, unfair, and uncalled-for criticism. If Mr. McGlynn and Mr. Savage can stand on our platform and help us in our Secular work, it is none of my business how they may compromise or violate their religious sentiments. I will state my opinion of the cartoons. I wish them continued by all means, but I would be glad to see those on the last page discontinued. I wish no compromise in illustrating the myths, yarns, and absurdities of the Bible, yet I am very much opposed to such caricatures of humanity. It is their inhuman and vulgar appearance that shocks the finer feelings of those who object. In illustrating the absurdities of the Bible, it would not in the least detract from the object if the human appearance was as fairly represented as the monkey, or as the American Indian at the landing of Columbus. Such a change would remove all objections. THOS. C. HEIGHTON.

SALEM, O., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I contribute my mite for the benefit of Brother Heston, to keep his illustrations in your paper before the public. It is too late in the day to take a step backward, when an overwhelming majority of the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are in favor of the pictures. The Christians will laugh at our calamity; mock, deride, and grin with hellish delight at the downfall of Mr. Heston's cartoons. I hav two friends that I hav been laboring with for their subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and they claim to be very much interested in your paper. So I hav come to the conclusion to send your valuable paper to them for one year, gratis. Please find inclosed post-office order for $10—$3 for the renewal of my paper, $3 for each of my friends, and $1 for four ANNUALS. The illustrations must liv, and your subscribers will see to it that they do not die. If the finances get low during any period of the year, or even at the present time, on account of Mr. Heston's study and labor, then let the Editor make an appeal to those who hav voted to sustain the pictures, and every voter will, I think, respond with his little dollar. I would rather be assessed $5 per year than see the discontinuance of Mr. Heston's noble work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. SIMEON SHARP.

AYER, MASS., Jan. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read the pros and cons of your subscribers relativ to the pictures. I am with the majority, in favor of the pictures. Heston puts it so that they that run can read, and the would-be blind are made to see in the pictures both the past and the prophetic. Bible adherents hav tried to picture the stories told therein; why should they object to Heston's illustrations? It is only a difference of imagination. The fault, if any, is in the stories, and here the shame comes too late. All stories appeal to the imagination; and as no two imagin alike, why not be gentle with each other, as we are as to the color of the hair or eyes, or the size of the hand or foot, over all of which we hav no control? So we would all differ with Heston as an illustrativ artist. Certainly the Bible-makers hav no reason to complain when their example is followed. Now to the point. When we want a thing that is in the market, buy it. If Heston puts on the market what we want, pay for it. We must not be like children looking wistfully at peanuts hoping some one will giv them some. Put this "V" down for the pictures. The only difference I see between Bible pictures and political cartoons is, the dead past is blind and insensible, while the living present is alive and sensitiv. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER—to all that brings light and freedom.

ELIJAH MYRICK.

PELLA, IA., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see there are quite a number of subscribers that oppose the cartoons. I think they are a good thing in several respects. First, they attract attention. Christians come to my house (I always hav THE TRUTH SEEKER lying on the stand), they see the pictures, then they want to know what they represent. They will then read the text below. They do not believe that is scripture, but Brother Heston accommodates them with chapter and verse. That starts them searching the Bible to see if Brother Heston has not lied. In that way they become enlightened as to what is in the Bible, when you could not reach them in any other way. I hav done some missionary work, and I find nearly every one likes the cartoons. I believe they help to keep up the paper and giv it circulation. Of course, Samson, as he stands there with the jawbone in hand after the great slaughter, certainly looks a little tough; but honestly I do not think the pictures overdrawn. He must hav even been a more hideous-looking monster. THE TRUTH SEEKER is full of solid argument, but you cannot get Christians to read it. They do not read such matter. Burlesque will excite them to investigate. I hav sent you nine subscribers all in the last year. You can credit five of them to the pictures. I hope to be able to send more this year. H. M. FISK.

OVERTON, GA., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Some of your subscribers having given their views on the cartoons, I will here express mine. Those on the last page representing Bible myths and characters are worse than useless, and in many instances unfortunately drawn and liable to do more harm than good. They at best are but touches of the ludicrous, and excite mirth rather than appeal to the reason, and in some instances sport with the noblest instincts of human nature. For instance, I will cite Eve weeping at the bier of Adam, and Jephtha returning from his victories and meeting his rejoicing daughter whom his rash vow had doomed to the altar of sacrifice. Now, whether Eve ever wept over Adam or not is immaterial, since the fact remains that women do weep, and who is more entitled to the enlightened sympathy of mankind than the poor woman who weeps for her dead husband while one son lies murdered and the other wanders an outlaw and a vagabond? Again, Jephtha may not hav made his terrible vow, and his daughter may not hav met the sacrifice, yet both were entirely possible, and the story as told is one of the most pathetic in the literature of all the world. On the other hand, the cartoons on the first page are good, and in many instances happy hits. The scathing attacks on the church, the representations of the mighty weight and march of Freethought in spite of all opposition, and the flagellations which Mr. Heston givs Comstock, are all superb, and his "What Ought to be Done with Sam Jones" perfectly fills the bill. J. E. B.

HARWICH, MASS., Jan. 7, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I am either sad, sorry, or sulky to think that among so many "Liberals" of this town, and some of them in very good financial circumstances, I cannot get one subscriber for our paper. I say "our" paper because it should be "of the people, for the people, and by the people;" or at least of the Liberals, for the Liberals, and by the Liberals. Those that are able ought to feel responsible enough to subscribe for themselvs, if not for others. Now, to use a familiar expression, "the head is right but the heart is not;" and I think if some smart lecturer should drift around this way and wake us up the heart would become right. We used to hav Liberal lecturers often, but for several years last past hav had scarcely any. I hav not the means to take the responsibility of defraying expenses—would that I had—but will do double duty. We need a Secular Union here, and, as I hav hinted above, if we wake up perhaps one can be started here. I appreciate THE TRUTH SEEKER—yes, and all the other Liberal papers, but being unable to pay for all I cling to the one which I think is unexcelled. As to the pictures, those on the front page are faithful portrayals of things transpiring to-day, while the serio-comic ones on the last page are just sarcastic enough to fit the lying, silly tales of the "Holy Queer." Just imagin how futil they would be were Samson made to look like Colonel Ingersoll—respectable. They would giv the H. Q. a respectability it does not deserve, instead of that aspect which better comports with the ridiculous narrations which abound in the barbarous book. When we read the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments" or "Gulliver's Travels" it is understood by all that they make no pretensions to be true narrations, but the bamboozled readers of the Holy Queer believe, or pretend to, that it is sacred and infallible; and nothing but strong, radical, iconoclastic words or pictures will adequately show up the shameful stories as they deserve to be shown.

I send money for the ANNUAL.

I would like to know how Father Hacker's circumstances are since he is left alone. B. F. ROBBINS.

MT. WASHINGTON, IND., Dec. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The one thing that surprises me most is, how men of even average intelligence can pass over without inquiry the numerous discrepancies of the Christian religion. Last night at a Baptist church the minister, after referring at length to the various institutions of civilization, said that the institutions of all kinds that were good, such as hospitals, colleges, etc., all owed their origin and support to Christianity; and gave as proof the "fact" that in no heathen lands where Christ had not been preached were any such institutions existing, and then on the heel of that doubtful "fact" thanked God that Christ had been preached in all of God's creation. Does not that preclude the possibility of there being any heathen lands where he has not been preached, and does it not make the whole thing sophistical?

A few evenings ago a "Rev." Bro. Clem preached a revival sermon here, and among his "facts" was the assertion that faith is more powerful than floods, earthquakes, fires, water, or even all of the silent forces of nature. How any sensible man can believe any such stuff, I am at a loss to understand. Has anyone ever witnessed an exhibition of faith attended with such results—the Johnstown flood, or any of the great earthquakes? Possibly he meant the faith that showed its strength with such destructiv power in the days of the Inquisition, and other kindred times.

My vote is for the pictures to continue. I will get the subscriber if possible. But in a place like this, of about one thousand inhabitants and four churches, it will not be easy. Inclosed please find twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. Yours for liberty, J. W. SLAYTON.

ST. JOHNS, ARIZ., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: First permit me to ask, Who the deuce is Parton? Is he, or it, some old woman's bugaboo, set up to frighten little children? If I understand the matter, Parton is simply a member of the genus homo, and as such no more than a simple unit in the great family of humanity. This being true, then why so much Parton this or Parton that? All this Partonism sounds of bugabooism, and reminds me of the old woman in Fielding, who was not going to be eternally "badgered by every ragmotical villain in the country." No one questions Mr. Parton's right to his individual opinions, but for me they cut no further figure in the case at issue. His "opinion" has no more weight in the ethics of "this or that," than would the opinion of any one of the thousands of intelligent readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I suppose if Mr. Heston should caricaturize (excuse the coinage) some of the absurdities contained in any other book, or the political follies of either of the political parties, or the like, it would, in the "eminent" opinion of Parton, be perfectly legitimate. To my mind the strictures of Parton are indicativ of a certain amount of toadyism to the old worn-out and threadbare superstitions of the Bible, and to that sentiment which ascribes to it divine origin. Mr. Heston is certainly doing for our cause precisely that which Mr. Nast did, through the medium of Harper's Weekly, for the cause of political reforms, neither more nor less. All in all, Mr. Heston's cartoons are excellent, and they are doing an immense amount of good by illustrating to the eye, and thence to the mind, the great quantity of grossness, bosh, and twaddle to be found in that rankest of humbugs known to the nineteenth century, yclept the "holy Bible."

ALBERT F. BANTA.

RED CANON, WYO., Jan. 10, 290.

MR. EDITOR: The love of the ridiculous can hardly be called a gross taste. From the amorba to man we find that mirthfulness vastly predominates at the human extreme of the gradation of life.

Ridicule tends to degrade something from a relativly higher to a lower place.

Religion has been a thing exalted to the mind of man for many generations.

It has been built up on a trestle-work of lies. When the ax of ridicule demolishes this trestle-work every lover of truth should rejoice.

Aristocracy, despotism, and religion hav, from their exalted positions, ever been in dread of the demolishing power of ridicule; thus they hav decried it as low and vulgar.

As far as we are able to comprehend the mental processes of animals, wit and ridicule seem to be as rare and little developed in them as the analytical and cause-discovering faculties of reason. Therefore, upon the philosophy of evolution there would seem more propriety in classifying mirthfulness among the higher faculties. It seems to me that Heston has done a good work in widening the application and utility of ridicule.

Pictorial ridicule vs. religion has its pioneer in Heston. In a few years all Liberals will cease to regard the tactics of ridicule with disgust, when ridicule is directed against the highly venerable institutions of religion. Like all new ideas, Heston's cartoons naturally meet with some opposition.

The despotisms of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries would never hav endured such ridicule as Puck and Judge now direct against our famous officials and politicians. Heston has directed some of the same article against the clergy, the church, and the Bible. Other men will soon take up his idea, and before many years things sacred will be treated by ridicule with as much impunity as things political. CHAS. E. BOYNTON, B.S., M.D.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Osman's First Speech.

Osman was a little child,
And still quite young and tender,
With short brown hair and quick gray eyes,
And stature small and slender.
Experience, then, had he none,
And little knew of others,
When he was sent to district school,
With sister and three brothers.

Ere this, but once had he been there,
The day before vacation,
When all the pupils showed their skill
At song and declamation.
Since then he, too, had learned a piece,
In his mind far excelling
The best one there, and this to prove
He e'er was more than willing.

So happily he went to school
This morning warm and sunny,
Resolved that should the chance occur,
He'd speak his piece so funny.
The teacher was a lady tall,
Brown-eyed, with manner kindly,
Who always won her pupils' love,
And never ruled them blindly.

The day passed on, a thousand things
The little novice learning,
And as he in his little mind
These many things was turning,
He now and then would speak aloud,
The pupils round disturbing;
And so the teacher thought to chide,
His lively spirits curbing.

"Don't speak aloud, my little man,"
Quite mildly said the teacher;
With confidence that might belong
To orator or preacher
He stepped before the school and spoke
Of "Jim Crow," and his cawing,
The teacher with surprise quite mute,
The scholars all ha-haing.

The teacher's words had passed unheard,
Except she spoke of speaking;
He, joyful, thought that now had come
The chance that he was seeking;
With tact the teacher passed it o'er,
And eagh one then returning
To book and slate, completed well
The lessons they were learning.

We older folks make like mistakes—
Oft, by misunderstanding,
Get plunged in water deep and cold,
And some can't make the landing;
May strength and wisdom help us find
The right which we are seeking,
And all mishaps as well result
As Ossie's with his speaking.

Jan. 14, 1890. A. LAURIE SAILOR.

A Kinship of Flowers.

William Bertermann talked to a reporter from behind a bank of roses of all tints and hues.

"This rose is a brother of this one," said he, as he laid out two beautiful flowers of the deep pink variety. "Here is the grandfather of these two," continued he, as he placed upon the counter a splendid red rose on a spindling stock, "and here is the grandmother."

The latter was a small white rose of unattractiv appearance but upon a rugged stalk. Then Mr. Bertermann pointed out the cousins and aunts and uncles and other relativs of the flowers he had exhibited.

"It's just like raising horses or hogs," said he. "The stock is continually improved by careful breeding. Flower-breeding has become a science, and, by crossing the best varieties every year, new and more beautiful flowers are being grown. A man who ceased to be a florist ten years ago could not go into a first-class flower garden now and recognize many of the flowers that we deal in most extensivly. There has been a mixture of blood, so to speak, until nearly all the old-time flowers hav lost their identity. Nearly all the flowers sold now are hybrids, or crosses between the most desirable old stocks."

Mr. Bertermann then explained the process of hybridization, the mere operation of which is easy enough. It is simply necessary to carry the pollen by means of a camel's hair brush, or otherwise, from one blossom and place it on the stigmatic surface of the flower of the other, or seed-bearer. A colony of bees in a flower garden will do the work better than it can be done with a brush. They constantly carry the pollen from one flower to another, but, of course, there is no system about the crosses they bring about. When hybridization is attempted the florist must be certain that the plants are receptiv. As a rule, by close observation the florist may become able to tell when to apply the pollen. Not a few plants develop stigmas and anther at the same time, and with them it is necessary to remove the anthers before they burst, and at the same time, by means of a fine gauze or otherwise, to prevent the visits of insects which might convey pollen from another flower and thus effect an undesirable cross.

This sometimes happens. A flower in good form, but defectiv in color, is perhaps crossed with another which is faulty in shape but of novel and desirable shade. A weakly grown variety may be used in an effectiv way in a combination with stronger grown, lacking the particular qualities of the former. As with the "grandfather" and "grandmother," Mr. Bertermann pointed out where, breeding the dark red rose, supported by a weak stalk, to the puny white rose on a healthy stalk, a splendid pink rose supported by a well developed stalk, was produced. Sometimes the florists' ideal is kept so constantly in sight that the pollen of a particular strain becomes more or less futil. Growers of cyclamen and gladiola habitually call in the aid of a microscope to determin the state of the pollen in a highly bred seedling. If it is found to be uneven, not plump, clear, and regular in size and outline, the plant is discarded as a propagator, and another chosen which promises to allow the desired results in size, form, and color of flowers.

Hybrids between two distinct genera are by no means common. Mr. Bertermann cited one example in philageria, a cross between the beautiful and climbing Lapageria roses and the bushy Thilesia buxofolio, which is intermediate between its two parents though not nearly so desirable as either. Species of the same genus frequently refuse altogether to cross with each other, and some again will cross only one way. Florists, however, hav never been able to lay down any definit rule, and exceptions can only be learned by experience. For the most perfect and symmetrical flowers it is best to select single flowers which are most perfect in their petals for seed bearers. Another interesting fact is that single or semi-double sorts with perfect carrolas will produce double flowers of a regular, symmetrical formation.

"It's a fascinating business," said Mr. Bertermann, "and the only trouble is, florists who make a business of raising flowers for the market, as we do, hav not the time to devote to hybridization. That work is done most successfully by gentlemen who make the business a constant study. The best man at hybridization in Indiana, perhaps, is the florist at Pardue University. He makes the breeding of flowers a specialty and is certainly very proficient in the business."

"Are artificial colorings much used now?"

"Very little as compared with former times, for the reason that all tints can be obtained by hybridization. Cut white flowers are sometimes placed in ink and by absorption they take on a blue tint. And then roses are sometimes given a blue tint by placing about their roots iron dust from around anvils in blacksmiths' shops.

"I observed a strange thing recently. I had placed some hyacinths in water, and after they had stood for a while the color all left them. In handling the earthen pots in which they were placed their departed color stuck to my hands from the outside of the pots. The water, it seemed, had drawn the coloring matter all out of the flowers and it had settled on the outside of the earthenware."

Correspondence.

LISBON, IA., Jan. 19, 1890.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I inclose a poem which perhaps you can make use of in the Children's Corner, which I fear is too good a place for it, for I hav always esteemed very highly the Children's Corner and its estimable editress.

With best wishes for its success, I remain,
Yours truly, A. LAURIE SAILOR.

[Thanks for your good opinion. We are glad to hear from you again. The Corner will never be "too good a place" for anything you may favor it with.—ED. C. C.]

CERYL, NEB., Jan. 25, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My school is out now. I am nine years old. I like to read the Children's Corner. I received for Christmas your book "The Story Hour," and I had to laugh to see the picture of the milk made on the wrong side of the cow. I like my book very well and I like to read the stories in it. I think little Susie must hav been a beautiful little girl; it was a pity she had to be taken away. I think I will always remember that story about her. All of us hav a very bad cold; my mamma is almost sick with a bad cold. We are talking of leaving the country if we can get our things sold off. We will go East. My brother and I can play a great many duets on the organ. As I can't think of any more to write I will close.

Your Freethinker friend,
MAUD A. OLMSTEAD.

CEDAR LAKE, N. Y., Jan. 16, 1890.

DEAR AUNT SUSAN: May I address you so, for I think you must be very tired of that oft-repeated "Dear Miss Wixon?" I confess I am. I like the way George J. Remsburg addresses you much better, and his letters are worth reading, too. We often wish we could see one of his papers, the Golden Dawn.

My pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I hav lived. I am nearly fourteen, and I hav always had Freethought papers and books to read. We take a paper for every day in the week. I take the Woman's Tribune, a woman's rights paper, and the Golden Days, a story paper.

The young people of the Corner often solicit correspondents, but I hav been very unfortunate, as I hav written to two of them, and my letters were never answered. I do not like to be treated in that way. I now invite the girls and boys of our Corner to write to me and I will promis to answer all letters to the best of my ability.

We hav just finished reading "Looking Backward." We three, my father, my mother, and myself, read it aloud. We are delighted with it. We liv in the country on a farm, and I attend a district school. Our scenery is most beautiful. I delight in making sketches. Some of our friends think I am quite an artist. I can enlarge small photographs to life-sized portraits with pencil or crayon on cards 22x28 inches. I hav had two of my pictures on exhibition this summer. My instructor is Prof. Cal Perry, of Delphi, N. Y. I should like to enlarge a picture of Aunt Susan, though I fear she will think I ask too much for my work, for I get $10 a picture.

We took great pleasure in reading the "Visit to Philadelphia." Do not forget to write to me soon. I will now close my third letter to the Corner. ELDA S. BILLINGS.

[Elda is one of our best girls. The world will hear from her by and by, for her mind is being prepared by good reading and high thinking for real work. All our time is fully occupied, and although we would be delighted to answer every letter we receive, yet it is impossible to do so. But our kind interest and good wishes are for Elda and for all. Yes; Elda may call us aunt if she likes. All good titles are in order—be they aunt, cousin, sister, friend, or teacher.—ED. C. C.]

A Predatory Dog Outwitted.

The other day a spaniel that had a bad habit of stealing poultry was seen approaching the house at a moderate trot with a large rooster in his mouth. The fowl seemed to be defunct, and so the spaniel evidently thought, for being somewhat wearied by his excursion, and the weather being warm, he laid down his prey for a moment in order to rest. But the rooster was alive and in full possession of all his faculties, for no sooner did he feel himself released from the jaws of the fell beast that had captured him than he fluttered his wings and struggled up among the branches of a convenient tree. The dog was so astounded at this miracle, as it must hav seemed to him, that he lost his presence of mind for a second or two, and in that interval his booty escaped. This tale is perfectly true—and I remember a very similar occurrence years ago—although I must confess it sounds a good deal like the beginning of one of Æsop's Fables.

How to See the Wind.

"Did you ever see the wind?"

"See the wind?"

"Yes, that's what I said. Did you ever see the wind?" asked a yachtsman, who was standing on a bluff of the Highlands watching the yachts sailing on the lower bay.

"No, I've never seen the wind," replied his friend.

"Well, I'll tell you how you may. Take a polished metallic surface of two feet or more, with a straight edge; a large handsaw will answer the purpose. Select a windy day, whether hot or cold, clear or cloudy, only let it not rain or the air be murky—in other words, let the air be dry. Hold this metallic surface at right angles to the wind—i.e., if the wind is north, hold your surface east and west—and incline it at an angle of 45°, so that the wind, striking, glances and flows over the edge. Now sight carefully over the edge at some small but clearly defined object, and you will see the air flow over as water flows over a dam."

THE terror: "Mamma, does God love me?" Mamma: "Yes, dear. And those whom God loves go to heaven. But he doesn't love you when you are a bad boy." The terror: "Then I guess I don't stand much show of heaven, do I?"

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Gems of Thought.

THE propagandists of the Submission to Injustice dogma became the faithful ally of every form of despotism. The pagan pride in the majesty of self-reliant manhood was superseded by the worship of abject self-abasement and self-distrust. If human nature was essentially evil, men were unfit for self-government; and their own welfare required the suppression of every revolt against the authority of the spiritual powers. Without the recognition of human rights, without the principles of personal dignity and natural justice, social order became a legalized system of oppression, manliness became a stigma, the love of freedom was denounced as a sign of an unregenerate heart. Hence, the national degradation of so many Aryan nations, their sickening flunkeyism, their heartless subservience to the caprices of brutal despots. As Herbert Spencer demonstrates in his masterly résumé of the dangers in the path of a progressiv republic, a defiant resistance to every form of injustice and official despotism is the price of liberty, and that resistance is incompatible with the spirit of a system that inculcates the duty of self-abasement as an article of faith.—Professor Oswald in the Secret of the East.

ARE not religion's ministers at the beck of the powers that be? If the first command be, "Fear God," is not the second, "Honor the king?"—R. D. Owen.

EVERY people hav gods to suit their circumstances. The Society Islanders hav a god called Toahita, in shape like a dog; he saved such as were in danger of falling from rocks and trees. I think we can do without him, as we hav not much climbing to do. Among them a man could make himself a god out of a piece of wood in a few minutes, which would frighten him out of his wits. . . . If I thought I could speak with discrimination and impartiality of the nations of Christendom, I should praise them, but it tasks me too much. They seem to be the most civil and humane, but I may be mistaken. . . . It seems to me that the God that is commonly worshiped in civilized countries is not at all divine, though he bears a divine name, but is the overwhelming authority and respectability of mankind combined. Men reverence one another, not yet God.—Thoreau.

RELIGION is man's earliest and also indirect form of self-knowledge. Man first of all sees his nature as if out of himself, before he finds it in himself. His own nature is at first contemplated by him as that of another being. What was formerly contemplated and worshiped as God, is now perceived to be something human. What was at first religion becomes at a later period idolatry; man is seen to hav adored his own nature.—Feuerbach.

THOSE whose intellects were most shackled by prejudice were regarded as the wisest of mankind.—Lecky.

THE ignorant mistake impudence for authority, solemnity for wisdom, and pathos for inspiration.—Ingersoll.

BUT if the mysteries of religion are incomprehensible to those who teach them; if among those who profess it, none can be found who knows precisely either what he believes or can giv any account of the motivs of his belief and conduct, this is not the case with respect to the difficulties which we oppose to this religion. These are within the reach of all, and are so simple as to be capable of convincing every man who renounces the prejudices of childhood, and deigns to consult that common sense which nature has bestowed on each individual of the human race.—D'Holbach.

RELIGION and science are enemies. One is a superstition; the other is a fact. One rests upon the false, the other upon the true. One is the result of fear and faith, the other of investigation and reason.—Ingersoll.

TOLERANCE is a most impious system, and contrary to the views of the clergy. It can only be practiced by those Christians whose lack of zeal leads them to betray the interests of the church, by allowing everyone to think in his own way on certain questions; and especially on such questions as no one can understand.—Voltaire.

IT is amazing to me that a difference of opinion upon subjects that we know nothing with certainty about, should make us hate, persecute, and despise each other.—Ingersoll.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Notes and Clippings.

THE World says that in the assemblage at Westminster Abbey at Browning's funeral, "the finest head and face" was that of the novelist and poet George Meredith. Mr. Meredith is a Freethinker.

A WOMAN in England named Sarah Calender is charged with cutting the throat of a child aged one year and with setting fire to the house. She is extremely pious, and asked for the Bible just before the deed was committed.

SECRETARY FOSTER of the National Reform Association says: "Under the influence of a secular government our Christian nation is being rapidly secularized. More than half the people never darken a church door. Out of 7,000,000 young men, 5,000,000 never enter a church."

THE other Sunday morning when the parishioners of Lewannich, Eng., went to their church they found it a mass of flames. Commenting on the frequency of these church conflagrations, the London Freethinker says the ministers will hav to preach from the text, "Our God is a consuming fire."

THE question as to whether a Roman Catholic bookseller can be forced to accept and fill orders under contract from his agents for the complete works of Victor Hugo is being tested in the superior court at Montreal, in the suit of C. B. Tache vs. Cadieux & Derome, booksellers, for $2,000 damages. Tache secured orders for these works, which his principals refused to execute. Several priests were examined and testified that, though the books were prohibited in the Index, they were not immoral.

A RUSSIAN newspaper asserts that recently in a spasm of virtue thirty-six villages petitioned the authorities for the issuance of a decree forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors within their limits. The petitions of thirty-five of the villages were denied, but the thirty-sixth was granted, and the inhabitants of it hav beaten to death their secretary because he made their petition too eloquent.

ARCHBISHOP CLEARY, in addressing a meeting of his church people at Tweed, Ont., referred to the separate school question. He said that the diabolical spirit of hatred of religious education had found its way into the province of Ontario. Satan had raised his standard there, and had sent forth from the gates of hell his army of demons (the Equal Rights Association) to propagate his wicked maxims throughout the cities and towns of the province.

A KANSAS justice has decided that corn is fuel, and therefore exempt from attachment. This may be pleasant news to distressed Kansas grangers who are using their granaries as woodhouses, says the Sun, but it seems a pretty sweeping sort of a judgment. If corn is fuel, why is not whisky made of corn also fuel? It is used even by the residents of bleeding Kansas to get up steam with. Quœre: Are Kansas drug-stores exempt from attachment on the ground that they are furnaces?

ALL women are in league against the bachelor, says Woman's Cycle, the married women from sympathy with their unmarried sisters and the unmarried from a desire to lessen the number of spinsters. With this league against him, offensiv and defensiv, the unmarried man may find peace in heaven, but he can scarce hope to find happiness on earth—this side of marriage. However, once married, all the bachelor's troubles are over. He is no longer the subject of interested or designing attentions—except the attentions which proceed from love. True, the bachelor becomes on his marriage, if not an object of commiseration to the knowing ones, an object of comparativ indifference to all women but one; but the superior love of that one atones for all, and his added dignity and completeness as a man and citizen make him wonder how he previously existed as one-half of a pair of scissors without the other half.

OF the recent ordination of the Plymouth church pastors the Mercury says: "If the spirits of the dead are permitted to take an occasional peep at earthly matters, it must hav delighted the soul of Henry Ward Beecher to listen to the charming expressions of heresy that fell from the lips of the present pastors of Plymouth church when examined by an ecclesiastical council for ordination. Dr. Abbott said that he did not know what the trinity meant and never used the phrase, and that he believed in the annihilation of the wicked; his assistant then trumped the trick by remarking that he thought a man might be a Christian who never went to church and believed in purgatory. Thereupon the council, which was composed of Congregational, Episcopal, Methodist, Baptist, and Dutch Reformed ministers, put their venerable heads together and said that the two heretics were all right and then settled them down over Plymouth church. Times change, and perhaps it is well that they do. Three hundred years ago all hands, including the council, would hav been burnt at the stake for heretics."

IT looks as though the emperor of Germany had become a practical Socialist, or else had determined to be the "father" to the German people that he thinks his "divine right" makes him. He has issued an order, or imperial rescript, addressed to Baron von Berlepsch, the new minister of commerce, in which he says that however valuable or important are the measures now in operation for improving the condition of the working people, they are not to be compared with what a proper performance of the duty before the new minister will require. He then specifically directs an extension in the application of the system of workingmen's insurance and the opening of an inquiry into all trade laws affecting factory labor. The emperor affirms in the rescript that it is the duty of the state to so regulate the duration and the nature of labor as to insure the health, the morality, and the supply of all the economic wants of the workingmen, and to preserve their claims to equality before the law. For the promotion of peace between workingmen and their employers legal measures must be taken toward the establishment of regulations empowering workingmen to appoint delegates enjoying their confidence to represent them in the settlement of affairs, these delegates safeguarding the interests of the workingmen whom they represent in all negotiations with the employers or with the government. Such a system would enable the workingmen to express their wishes and grievances peaceably and freely, and would giv the authorities of the state an opportunity to inform themselvs in a very direct way of the condition of the working people, thus keeping in touch with all their activities, sentiments, and impulses.

A Symposium.

DESTRUCTIVE, CONSTRUCTIVE, OR BOTH?

Is Freethought a System of Negation Solely, or a Constructive Philosophy ample in itself to replace Religion?

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.	F. M. HOLLAND.
LUCY N. COLMAN.	PARKER PILLSBURY.
MRS. MATTIE P. KREKEL.	C. B. REYNOLDS.
J. H. BURNHAM.	W. F. JAMIESON.
CHAS. WATTS.

Is there an Affirmative, Positive, Constructive side to Freethought?

If not, the reason why?

If there be, in what, in your opinion, does it consist, and in what should it consist?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE CALIFORNIA STATE SECULAR UNION:

There is an affirmative, positive, and constructive side to Freethought—in fact, Freethought is essentially creative. There can be no advance without it. It means everything that can possibly be attained by the human mind.

The liberty of man is absolutely progressive. If not, then man is by nature worthless. If man must be forced by some outside pressure to be what he cannot naturally be, then man is like a clod. For if the same outside pressure or force were applied to the clod the clod would be as good as the man. For, by the nature of the case, it is not the man or the clod that has any ability, but simply the foreign or supernatural power which strikes and compels.

No act of man is of value to man except his free act. A forced act means nothing, is nothing to that being who performs the act. It is no expression of the being itself.

What is the act of the machine to the machine or of the slave to the slave? Simply nothing. It may serve others, but so far as the machine or the slave is concerned, it is of no service. It does not construct them. A supernatural force might be benefited by what it compels man to do. But man himself cannot be benefited. He can only be benefited by that which he does voluntarily.

In every sphere of thought, feeling, and action, liberty is absolutely requisite to life and progress. Slavery is simply death. The thought of a slave, the feeling of a slave, the act of a slave, is simply a dead thought, feeling, and act.

Whatever life man has springs from his freedom. All grandeur of thought, glory of imagination, magnificence of art, come from his unshackled faculties.

Science is the product of Freethought. Man can not know unless he is free. He cannot organize knowledge except through freedom. He cannot add to knowledge except through freedom. The moment science becomes authority it is dethroned. Science is not authority—that is compulsion; but it is persuasion, influence. It is a constant appeal to and result of man's free reason. Science is the eternal offspring of Freethought, ever being born anew out of man's immeasurable activities. Science is that which always is becoming—it never simply is. The moment it crystallizes to "what is," it shakes hands with theology and becomes tyranny and superstition. Science is the whole of man's active knowledge It is that which discovers—which invents, which realizes imagination and conquers nature. It is the soul of art, the spirit of life. The boundless riches of science are the gift of Freethought.

The noblest morality is the expression only of Freethought. The morality of orthodoxy is stationary. It consists in rules and regulations. Its supreme virtue is obedience. Morality in its highest sense, however, is not a rule, a regulation. It is a choice. It is the whole being flowing to action, and to action based upon present knowledge and intuition, and not upon a past commandment. Morality, to be of value, must be the free fruitage of all that one is—not a repetition of what has been in his experience or that of others. Morality is dynamical, not mechanical. It cannot always be the same, for it is relative, not absolute. Morality cannot be absolute unless the universe were unchanging. If the universe changes, then morality changes. Morality springs from a relation, not from a fact. It is circumstances that make duties, not merely being itself. Merely to exist is not to be morally bound. It takes a certain kind of existence to create morality. To make morality possible the following condition is necessary: a free being surrounded by other free beings. Without such a relation moral action is unattainable. A slave has no duties. He cannot own anything, simply because he is owned. Orthodoxy makes morality absolute, but it only makes a rule, a regulation, a convention absolute, and so its morality becomes a tyranny and a foe to human progress. Morality cannot be absolute—that is, unchanging, for the reason that circumstances are always changing. They are never the same, and therefore there is a constant exercise of judgment and choice of the highest. There cannot be simply a reliance upon past choices. Morality is of to-day, not of yesterday. It is the best that one can do now—not the best one could do last year or even an hour ago. It is the perfection of the present moment—not of any other moment. Morality is absolute only in this sense—that in the same set of circumstances the same duty arises. But circumstances do not exactly recur. They may be similar, but not the same. Nature does not repeat itself, nor humanity. In all the endless ages the universe nor man will be what it or he was yesterday or what it or he is to-day, and hence in all the endless ages there will never be the same duty to perform. Something like it, perhaps, but not identical.

We must know the circumstances of to-day, the relations of to-day; study them profoundly in order to understand the duties of to-day. This understanding can only come by Freethought, by science. All morality, therefore, is built upon Freethought.

Freethought cultivates the heart. It gives dreams, hopes, aspirations. It unfolds a world of art, of music, of poetry. The sentiments of Freethought are the sublimest of which man is capable. They are the sentiments which animate, ennoble, fructify. They make beautiful the pathway of mankind. The bloom of flower and glow of star, the sea and sky, the vast frame of nature are immeasurably exalted in the atmosphere of Freethought. Melody, light, and color are wonderfully interfused with splendor and joy. The emotions become a vast ocean, responsive and sparkling, to the ever-changing world.

Freethought teaches self-respect, the dignity and glory of our being, that in ourselves the divinity exists and not in the skies or on any throne. Man must be upright, without fear, for if there is a God in the universe he must respect man even as man respects him, not for his power but for his goodness.

Freethought teaches sympathy—sympathy with all life, all men, all being.

It teaches reverence for all life—that which is above, around, beneath; that which is in sun and grain, in the infinite ranks of stars and crystal drop.

Freethought recognizes the unity of life. All life is one, equally beautiful, equally glorious, and equally sacred. That is sacred, that is divine, which helps humanity, which makes two blades of grass grow where there was but one before; which increases happiness, decreases misery.

Freethought is constructive in its sentiments as well as in its ideas. It makes for art, for music, for romance as well as for truth, for science, and for morality.

Freethought is coöperative in the highest sense of the word, for it means fraternal coöperation. It would make the state—if state there be—stand for human rights, for justice. It would make social order the child of liberty. It would make all industry the expression, the result of freedom, the flowering forth of the inward faculty and desire, and not the drudgery of the hand. Freethought would make the bond of union attraction. It recognizes the rights of the minority as well as majority. It stands for the one man as well as for the million. It declares that the slavery of the least is the degradation of the greatest. It believes in the universal republic based on the consent of the governed, of all the governed, each moment of its power.

Is Freethought constructive in institutions? It will be when it has the wealth and power of orthodoxy. But Freethought does not run to institutions, and it would ever keep them subservient to life. All institutions and organizations are necessarily limitations. They must be the result of a compromise. Therefore they must be constantly watched and not allowed to become old. It would be a good thing if every institution, every organization, ceased to be at the end of fifty years and new ones were put in their place. The older an institution, the better for orthodoxy—the younger an institution the better for Freethought. The secret of civilization is to prevent all institutions and all organizations from ever growing old. Let men grow old and wise, but let the instrumentalities they use be forever new, forever free. It is the individual only who should become gray-haired and venerable. Every institution should be killed the moment it becomes white with age. The crown of glory to the individual is the curse of tyranny in the institution.

Construction and institution are not the same. The world confounds them. The masses cannot recognize anything unless it becomes instituted. Orthodoxy runs to institution, Freethought to construction. Orthodoxy makes the institution command the life. Freethought makes the life command the institution. Freethought puts construction before and after institution and makes institution merely a means for constant improvement. Orthodoxy makes institution the end, and it constructs merely to institute. It is the institute that is the supreme thing to the orthodox mind.

Because Freethought is not institutional it is regarded as destructive. This is confounding the shell with the germ that produces it—the mill-wheel with the river that makes it turn—the engine with the steam that gives it motion. Freethought is by its very nature constructive, but constructive not in results mainly, but in the grand elemental powers of humanity, in truth, in science, in art, in industry, in poetry. Freethought is the force at the heart of things, the germ, the river, the steam. In thought, emotion, action, it is the spirit that creates, that builds, that improves. Orthodoxy is the shell, the wheel, the engine, the institution. It is merely the mechanic of the universe, the drudge. Freethought is the worker, the artist, the poet. It plows the soil, it plants the seed, it reaps the harvest. Freethought is the pendulum, swinging to the eternal rhythm of the true and beautiful and good. Orthodoxy is simply the hand that marks the time, or rather, it is only the figure upon the dial-plate.

F. M. HOLLAND:

There is an affirmative, positive, constructive side to Freethought. If there were not, there could not be a negative one; for all negations involve affirmations. We do not all agree in our affirmations, or in our negations either; but it would be a great help to our work to make the affirmative side more prominent than has hitherto been done. No one has the right to impose his own affirmations or negations on others. I do not even undertake to say what our affirmative side is at present, though this will be made pretty plain by the present series of essays I merely suggest that it should contain something equivalent to these ten affirmations, which, as a whole, are ours distinctively.

I. Order reigns both in matter and in mind; all actions and events are results of finite causes; and they are also causes from which new results proceed necessarily.

II. Only faith in the omnipotence of natural laws can make us realize the certainty with which moral laws enforce themselves.

III. Science is our best guide; and her methods are sufficient for attaining all possible truth.

IV. The moral laws are necessary conditions of human existence; and it is the recognition of this fact by mankind which gives authority to conscience.

V. We know more about morality than was ever known before; especially as regards the duties of making money and rising in the world, of treating animals kindly, and of recognizing the rights belonging to women, to members of other races, and to holders of opinions differing from our own.

VI. Learning to think correctly and independently is not only a duty in itself, but a help to performing all other duties.

VII. Individual liberty ought to be under no restraints, except such as are needed for the protection of person and property, or the maintenance of free institutions of government.

VIII. We ought to take all the innocent pleasure and recreation we want, especially on Sunday.

IX. Our race has raised itself to a higher average of intelligence, virtue, comfort, and happiness than was ever known before; and the poor have gained even more than the rich.

X. All that is on earth ought to be improved, according to scientific methods of reform.

These ten affirmations may be condensed into three, namely, Science, Freedom, and Progress.

FRED. MAY HOLLAND.

FROM AN ANTISLAVERY APOSTLE:

There is, I think, certainly an Affirmative side to Freethought, as all thinkers affirm more than they deny. We affirm the right of every human being to all that his necessities require, whether physical, mental, or moral. We affirm or demand that society be so constructed that all these wants can be supplied without overtaxing the capabilities of each individual. We affirm and declare that the Christian religion, that encourages poverty by commanding its adherents not to "lay up treasure on earth, but the rather in heaven," is flagrantly immoral, inasmuch as each individual is, or should be, required to labor for his own support, society making such labor possible. And as human nature, besides growing old, and being by age rendered incapable of labor, is often disabled by accidents of various kinds, the "treasure" laid up here, in this world, is much more easily obtainable for needful use than though it were in the far-away fabled heaven. If by Constructiveness one means formulating a theory of religion or worship I am not in favor of Constructiveness. Why not? First. Because the intellect is constantly growing, and soon finds itself hampered by restrictions. Second. We have Liberal religious theories already formulated quite as unobjectionable as any we should be likely to produce. As for instance, Positivism. Strip it of its Frenchisms. Americanize it and worship not an unseen or unknown God, but the god Humanity. Such, I suppose, is the religion of the "Church of Humanity." Again, the church presided over by Mr. M. J. Savage, of Boston, is exceedingly Liberal. To be sure, when asked at Philadelphia (after his description of his God) if he prayed, instead of saying Yes, or decidedly No, his answer was, "'Twould take me an hour to answer that question." I presume it does not take him (Mr. Savage) an hour a week to do all his public praying. All Freethinkers have their hours of meditation and contemplation—that is, I suppose, "worship." It may not always be "reverential awe," but meditation upon this wonderful physical nature is certainly inspiring. Our students and philosophers are constantly making new discoveries, ascertaining the how and the why of many things which till very recently have been sealed books to us. But that they have found out a God other than nature, whose highest production is man, I have yet to learn. Our scientific, Christian, Unitarian clergyman of my own city, Dr. Calthrap, recently said in his pulpit—as reported in the daily paper—as God could not make something out of nothing, and he had nothing but himself, so he made this beautiful universe out of himself. So even this God of the most Liberal Christian is limited in material to work with. For my own part I call the name of my God Justice. And as I do not find in the physical universe that attribute, or indeed any personal attribute, it seems to me foolish to try to give it personality. In the human being we find all the possibilities which in different ages have made up the God. Why not accept it, and, if you please, worship it? What is worship? Webster gives as one definition, "Love." I like that definition. What a world this will be, so much better than the heaven of the Christian, when all human beings shall be treated with justice, and beside Justice around every human being there shall be a halo of Love—no more desolation of spirit, no more feeling that we are alone, knowing that we are, by virtue of our humanity, one family! Life in such circumstances, instead of "being duty," becomes joyous. But what of death? When we have had our fill of a happy, joyous life, and have become old with the infirmities of age depressing us, we will sleep the sleep of death. We have no proof that we shall waken, but we do not deny it, we will try to be reconciled—even to another life if this one has been filled with joy.

I have thought a good deal about it being a duty for Liberals to institute and support a Sunday public meeting. I see no objection to it, and there are, or would be, many advantages, the most important of which is, our children would have something which should be to them what the Sunday-schools are to the children of Christians. They would become acquainted with each other. They would learn the principles of Liberalism as presented by different minds. Then they would learn to speak themselves, and they would find great enjoyment in singing, dancing, declaiming, playing games, etc. Were we once a month, or perhaps once in three months, to provide a feast of fine fruits or any other delicacies, and while around the board remember with love and gratitude the martyrs to the cause of liberty and Freethought, it would be a kind of worship in which all ages could join, and would be more sensible than "drinking the blood or eating the body of the Christian's God."

The only real objection to such gathering is the very few who are willing to thus identify themselves with Liberalism. Perhaps such gatherings would increase our numbers. LUCY N. COLMAN.

FROM AN ANTISLAVERY APOSTLE:

Mr. Parker Pillsbury, though unable to write a full exposition of his views, owing to a recent attack of pneumonia which still confines him to his room, responded in a private note from which we take the liberty to make the following brief extract:

MY DEAR SIR: Your proposition is not quite intelligible to me, so I shall only write for your private eye. Freethought must have all the sides of any thought. Nor, as seems to me, can any real question or proposition on any possible theme be of only one side. Mr. Emerson says somewhere: "Given the upper side to find the under." So it seems to me of all given sides.

An old Hebrew minstrel sang: "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

I would call no man a fool for any such reason. But should the other side come up and affirm as positively that there is a God, and then proceed to burn me at the stake for refusing to believe his statement, even were it true, my vote and voice would be very likely to go to the other side—to the Liberal side, or the side that did not burn, nor in any way interfere with the mere belief of any human being even were it positive unbelief or Atheism.

Your real question it seems to me is best stated in your opening suggestions in these words: Whether "Liberals should build a religion, or philosophy, or system of morality as well as destroy the system founded on superstition and supernaturalism."

I do not hesitate to say that supernaturalism might be ruled out of the controversy, and all it means. To me, it seems an impossibility. Can anybody tell us who invented such a word? And for what purpose it was invented? It must mean a story above nature. But who knows how many stories high nature is? Or where nature stops, and super, or higher, begins?

Certainly reason is natural. And the wisest divines in the church admit it. Bishop Butler in his "Analogy" says: "Reason can and ought to judge not only of the meaning, but also of the morality and the evidence of revelation. . . ." And again he says: "Let reason be kept to; and if any part of the scripture account of the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ can be shown to be really contrary to it, let the scripture, in the name of God, be given up." And when has the church of England ever produced any brighter luminary than Bishop Butler?

And even our American Hebrew scholar and professor, Moses Stuart, wrote: "When all is said and done, the understanding and the reason remain to be satisfied. Nothing will stand that does not compose them to peace."

Superstition is another word you name in connection with supernatural. But that word only represents certain states of mind naturally resulting from ignorance and especially as relating to what are commonly called religious questions, and not limited to degrees of ignorance at all.

If Freethought or Liberalism tends to undermine the safeguards of virtue in any way, or to weaken in any way the just and necessary safeguards of justice and righteousness, integrity and honor, with which human society seeks to protect itself, then surely it should be held responsible for all damage done, or danger threatened.

And should any ask my meaning of the term virtue, Bishop Butler should again answer for me, thus: "It is that which all ages and all countries have publicly professed; it is that which every man you meet puts on the show of; it is that which the primary and fundamental laws of all civil constitutions over the face of the earth, make it their business and endeavor to enforce the practice of on mankind; namely, justice, veracity, and regard for the common good."

If Liberalism seeks the subversion, or tends to the subversion, of such virtue as is here described, and such rules of life, public or private, as above laid down, then it is surely pertinent and proper to demand, What have you for the world instead? And I for one should feel bound to answer, and to show my better work and way, and to exemplify it in all my outward and inward, my private and public life.

Concord, N. H. PARKER PILLSBURY.

MATTIE P. KREKEL:

I looked! Aside the dust-cloud rolled;
The Waster seemed the Builder, too;
Up-springing from the ruined Old,
I saw the rising New.
'Twas but the ruin of the bad,
The wasting of the wrong and ill;
Whate'er of good the old time had
Was living still. —Whittier.

What is Freethought?

When this question is answered all your questions are practically answered; in other words, these questions reduced to their simplest form mean, What is Freethought in itself, and what is to be inferred from it?

Freethought means, first of all, mental self-assertion, that is, until the individual arrives at that point mentally, where he or she asserts selfhood, the right and ability of self to use mental powers independently of all forms of asserted or enforced outside authority, there is no such thing as Freethought.

And if Freethought means emancipated selfhood, recognition of self-supremacy, of individual authority and rights, if this is the initial point of Freethought, then what is called Freethought, as a whole, can be no more or less than the collective intellectual and moral sentiments of such thinkers; and it must follow, if man is a progressive being, that as a whole, Freethought is assertive and affirmative, for the disproof of an incomplete, or false theory, must lie in the statement and proof of the complete and true one.

Mental effects are as true to mental causes, as are physical effects to physical causes; doubt in the mind of man is the impregnation of old explanations and theories by apprehension of new facts; and that doubt, born of the apprehension of something new, something beyond, a more intelligible explanation, is only the foundation upon which the new rests. The fact that the mental processes are active enough in any brain to see the defects of a theory, or attempted explanation of any phenomena, argues that they are active enough to see inferentially that if the attempted explanation is incorrect, some other one must be the solution; and while it does not necessarily follow that all can reason from inference to conclusion, it does follow, logically, that there is a conclusion, and necessarily an affirmative, constructive side to Freethought. And your question, in what does it consist, is easily answered.

Practically it consists of that intelligent comprehension of natural law which, applied to the whole system of facts, or reported facts, which go to make up the history of a people, will eliminate from it the supernatural element; as well as anticipate the action of that law on present physical, mental, and social conditions. When the mind began to act naturally and fully, that is, when the mind became emancipated to a degree, it began to cognize nature; from the cognition of law to its application is a natural mental process. Undoubtedly the first effect of applying correct analysis to natural phenomena, or scientific criticism to assumed or reported historical occurrences, was, and is, destructive, but to destroy, means also to rebuild, and the correct explanation, in destroying supernaturalism, gave the whole realm of natural law to rebuild upon.

Undoubtedly cultured Freethought consists in applying known and determinate factors to explanation of present, and apprehension of future results; its applying exact social methods to produce uniform social results toward building up harmonious and ideal communities; but the trouble in answering your last question, "In what should it [constructive Freethought] consist?" lies in the fact that Freethinkers cannot agree among themselves what methods, or what results, are the most desirable. I believe our worthy president of the national association is experiencing a practical demonstration of that fact; while, at the same time, he is trying to answer your query through his prize manual.

Our Freethinking friends will remember what a commotion was raised in our ranks a few years since by proposing "a consensus of the competent." Any "consensus" which does not include all the incompetents, is too narrow a platform for our reformers. Yet I suppose all Freethinkers concede the point that any advancement of the race means, first of all, healthful, natural conditions for the individual, regulated into social order and harmony. Therefore, in my opinion, the constructive side of Liberalism should consist in affirming and proving that man is part of the orderly development of the universe, perfectly natural, and if he ever arrives at perfection—naturally perfect; that he is an individual part of the universal family, individually limited in action, universally related through interest and sympathy; that only when the individual is excellent, can the race become ideal.

Constructive Freethought should teach that morality without responsibility is impossible, either individually or collectively, and that any system or theory, which proposes to make man moral before it elevates him to responsibility, is a fraud. It should affirm that, as in civilized life, the individual is responsible to society, so in return and proportion society is responsible to the individual. It should call attention to the fact that any attempt of society to benefit one portion of itself by degradation of another portion, is a fallacy which refutes itself by degeneration of the whole. In short, it seems to me that constructive Freethought should teach the sacredness and inviolability of personal freedom, the authority of truth, and the universality and supremacy of law. Faithfully yours,

MATTIE P. KREKEL.

C. B REYNOLDS:

Liberalism is affirmative, positive, and constructive.

Liberalism affirms that happiness is the only good, and therefore the first duty of every human creature is to attain to the highest possible happiness; that any course that does not promote human happiness here and now is bad; that any course that does promote human happiness is good.

Liberalism affirms that to enjoy is life's first duty, and that those who live the purest, best, and most useful lives enjoy the most; that kindness is the soul of all goodness, and that they who think and act kindly, those who by their ministrations of love and benevolence make a heaven here and now for themselves and loved ones, are best fulfilling life's duties.

Liberalism affirms that to "do to others as you would they should do to you," the grand old Golden Rule of all pagandom, a rule quoted and indorsed by Jesus of the New Testament, but according to its testimony never by him practiced, is the grandest rule ever conceived for the promotion of human happiness.

Liberalism affirms that to do good is the only genuine religion.

Liberalism is positive that if all would act justly, it would insure the best and most perfect happiness of humanity. Justice should therefore be our only creed.

Liberalism insists that it is our duty to learn what is right, and do it. Do it all the time, not from hope of heaven or fear of hell, not merely from considerations of personal reward and punishment, but that we should do right from love of right, prompted and encouraged thereto by the conviction that we thus promote the best interest and happiness of our fellow-creatures, and thereby secure our own.

Liberalism demands that every facility be afforded to all for the cultivation of the reasoning faculties; that young and old should be incited to a spirit of emulation in the study of science, in the search for truth, and be taught to weigh the evidence, accept only the facts, and ignore all prejudice in making decisions.

Liberalism insists that to select the good and to reject the bad in any and every religion, is a right every person should exercise without incurring hate, ostracism, or persecution here, or threats of punishment hereafter.

Liberalism insists on the right of the individua and is opposed to all monopolies. Justice ever! Justice for all. The emancipation of woman and the elevation of man.

Liberalism insists that to do right is of infinitely more importance than to believe right; that if we learn how to live, we need have no anxieties about how to die.

Liberalism insists that since the world affords and does demand the fullest exercise of all our powers and faculties, it is best to abstain from all anxiety and indulgence in idle speculations in regard to our course or condition in another world until after we arrive there; that to live lives of love, truth, and benevolence, making for ourselves and all around us a heaven here and now, is the best possible preparation for the enjoyment of any real or imaginary heaven of the future.

Liberalism is constructive. It is a practical common-sense rule of daily life, securing the greatest possible happiness by attaining the highest possible mental and physical development. Since man is especially adapted to live in this world, the cultivation of reason and sociability cannot fail to result in the greatest good to all, alike individually and collectively.

Liberalism therefore regards it as a first and most imperative duty to afford facilities, and to incite old and young to diligent study of hygiene, physiology, and the laws of procreation, so that knowledge of our physical and mental organization may enable us to reap the enjoyment that springs from a life ordered in harmony with nature's laws, so that we can save ourselves and our children from the terrible penalties that inevitably follow violation of the laws of our being—penalties from which no vicarious atonement can possibly save us.

Liberalism teaches that science is man's true providence; ignorance (the only real devil) his greatest enemy; the printing-press man's true savior.

Liberalism claims a real basis of morality should be sought in the cultivation of mind and heart, which will render actual present returns for every effort made; that those actions only are moral which are beneficial to mankind and which promote the general good.

Liberalism insists that all should constantly endeavor so to act that our deeds do no harm to others, and leave no injurious effects upon the actor. Hence the Liberal who is guilty of persistence in vice or crime, who does aught to willfully cause known trouble or unhappiness to any human being, is a living lie, false to every principle and teaching of Liberalism.

Liberalism teaches that our emotions should be controled by reason and regulated by judgment, and that morality should be studied and practiced, unfettered by church, creeds, or theologies.

Liberalism teaches, punishment of the wrong doer for reformation only—never for vengeance. That realizing our own weakness we should be pitiful to the unfortunate who have yielded to temptation, mindful of the fact they have fallen where we perchance have stumbled, and it is our duty to do all in our power to help them to retrieve the past by genuine repentance. Not the repentance of the church, that can be indulged in four hundred and ninety times—Matt. xviii, 21, 22—but a repentance founded on conviction of having done wrong, which produces genuine contrition that prompts free confession and full compensation and ultimates in conversion, a turning from the downward path of wrong, and perseveringly ascending the steep hill of rectitude.

Liberalism teaches that difference of opinion, more especially on mere speculative questions, should never disturb social harmony or sunder friendship.

Liberalism teaches we should first secure a heaven of peace and serenity in our own hearts—live so as to be worthy of our own self-respect—abstain from all violations of the principles of Liberalism, and so never have need of any scapegoat to bear the burden of our villainies or pay the penalty of our rascality.

Liberalism favors organized earnest opposition to Christian bigots and fanatics who desire union of church and state, recognition of God and Christ in the Constitution—the destruction of our public schools—enforcement of rigid Sunday laws—exemption of all church property from taxation—the fostering of priestly tyranny—the retarding of scientific education and the inculcation of superstition—the elevation of the cross above the stars and stripes of freedom.

The seeming lack of construction is because of lack of practical organization. When Liberalism has its local society in every school district, with its science school on Sunday—and its semi-monthly social; when every state has practical organizations so that every Liberal, however lowly, will feel assured in case of religious persecution, or any attack upon his rights, that the entire power and influence of every Liberal in the state will be united in his defense, the weak-kneed mollusks will be creatures of the past, and none shall question the construction of Liberalism, for all will witness its fulfilling its good mission—sweeping away all the terrors of the supernatural—bringing peace and joy to all—refining, educating, teaching love and gentleness—plucking fear from the mind and sectarian hate from the heart and making brotherhood to all alike—inducing all honest hearts to live lives of love instead of making professions of faith—studying nature and her laws instead of creeds and catechisms; —ourselves relieving distress, supplying the needy, comforting the sorrowing, lightening the burden of the overworked, instead of making long prayers to a God to do it for us—earning the deserved blessings of all future generations, because we secured the perpetual elevation of our glorious flag of liberty above the cruel cross of superstition.

C. B. Reynolds.

From the Editor of "Secular Thought:"

Practically there are only two answers necessary in replying to the questions submitted in this Symposium upon the part of those who allege that Freethought has a Positive and Constructive side, inasmuch as giving the "reason why" involves stating "in what does it consist?"

1. Does Freethought possess a positive, a constructive phase? In my opinion decidedly yes. I desire here to state that I recognize a difference between Freethought and Secularism. Briefly, Freethought represents a mental condition independent of the fetters of all creeds, dogmas, and traditional authority, while Secularism is all this and something more—it prescribes certain moral rules to guide the intellectual freedom acquired. The philosophy of Freethought, from its very nature, is positive and constructive, as well as being negative and destructive. It proclaims the right to think and to give expression to such thoughts without being subjected to any kind of threats or persecution for so doing. With a Freethinker no topic is too sacred to be discussed, no opinion too extreme to be entertained, provided it has been arrived at by a legitimate and careful course of reasoning. He holds no wild and whimsical notions regarding the free actions of his faculties uncontroled by organization and circumstances; but the freedom that he contends for is to hold and to publish his honest convictions on every subject upon which he may have exercised his mental powers. Freethought is not limited to one class of subjects, but extends alike to all—political, social, and scientific. Its domain is as wide as men's thought, and the sphere of its operations commensurate with the action of the human mind. Thus Freethought is twofold in its nature—positive and negative.

2. Wherein does its positive phase consist? In its being opposed to that which is false. Negation to error implies being positive to its antithesis—truth. For instance, Freethinkers negate theological restrictions, biblical infallibility, and the orthodox compulsion of belief; but they are positive to the opposite of these, mental liberty, the right of eclecticism, and the freedom to disbelieve where reason withholds its consent to any other course. Freethought has proved itself positive in the part it has played in the many progressive movements in the past. If we glance at the advancement made in the development of human thought that characterized such landmarks in intellectual freedom as the Revival of Learning, the Reformation, the introduction of Nonconformity, the deistical controversies of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the transformation of the nature of Christianity as it was preached in the last century to what is inculcated by the intelligence of the church to-day, we shall discover the Constructive work of Freethought. It was the same positive force that secured in England freedom of speech, the liberty of the press, the disestablishment of the Irish church, a national education, and the many other advanced measures which mark the progressive history of that country. The same can be said of this side of the Atlantic. It is Freethought that illuminates the grand and unsurpassed republic of America, and that is now active in endeavoring to shed a much needed brilliancy of intellectual liberty upon orthodox Canada. On either side of this vast continent Freethought is doing positive work in vindicating the Sunday from ecclesiastical and priestly monopoly, in removing tax-exemptions from church property, and in rescuing education from dogmatic theological teaching. All this is decidedly positive and constructive work of the greatest importance. Moreover, Freethought has ever been the emancipator of the human mind, the liberator of human thought, and the precursor of human progress. This fact has been amply demonstrated by such able writers as Draper, White, Lecky, Buckle, J. S. Mill, and others in passages too well known by Freethinkers to render it necessary to give quotations here in support of the allegations.

True, there have been times, alas! too frequently, when the Constructive policy of Freethought has had, for the time being, to yield to Destructive work. But such a course has been rendered necessary either through theological restrictions, priestly usurpations, or political despotism. Still, even under these unfortunate conditions, the positive side of Freethought was manifest in the destroying of impediments to personal freedom and national advancement. Despite, however, all opposition, Freethought is at the present time the emblem of mental freedom, the foliage of unfettered intellectuality, and the blossom of the true independence of the human race.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again," and although Freethought has often been partially crucified between the two thieves of ignorance and superstition, it has risen again and again until now it occupies the proud position of being a successful John the Baptist in the domain of thought and intelligence, preparing the people for the reception of the Secular savior of truth. J. H. Burnham.

A definition is demanded as the basis of a correct understanding of the term "Constructive Liberalism." As soon as the attempt is made to render a definition the trouble begins. For it is hardly likely that any two will define these words in the same terms, and this necessarily negatives construction. The point of real discrimination is one that is very difficult to make—that is, between Liberalism and that which it antagonizes. Liberalism has never been creeded, and the terms of its definition render that impossible. Before this term Liberalism is understandingly definable it is necessary to consider two forces which lie behind all history and mold all human conduct through and by a third force which comes of the preceding forces. The first is supernatural (not that there is any such thing as the supernatural). The second is natural, and the resultant force is the artificial (art and science). Liberalism in the first term of its definition discards the first so-called form of force. Liberalism denies its existence. But inasmuch as it has a credited existence in this world, and inasmuch as that credited existence has had an effect upon all history, it compels recognition in the terms of a real existence. Liberalism necessarily antagonizes this force, and it would displace it in its practical spheres upon the people, as it is already displaced in rational thought. Its rejection is fundamental to any definition possible which purports to mean Liberalism. In the light of the limits which beset us on every side it has no meaning in any systems as rational thought, seeing that it—whatever that may be—lies beyond nature. As unreasonable as it is to thinking people, it has had almost universal sway and it has written the world's history in blood. It has ruled the world, and all the progress which has been made has been in spite of this despotic force. Supernaturalism represents the deformed, abnormal side of all history. All of the crimes and tortures of the centuries are the cruel gifts of the supernatural. Liberalism in the first term of its definition is the ceaseless foe of supernaturalism. Naturalism, on the other hand, is simply the force of nature, and evidences to the investigator a law of development as evolution. Its tendency is through ceaseless differentiation to force improvement on the ground of the survival of the fittest—that of selection. This lesson is impressed upon all thoughtful students of nature. Hence we have as the second term in the definition of Liberalism, allegiance to nature, the indorsement of the natural. It is infidel to supernaturalism and faithful to the natural. The practical side of Liberalism is in the removal of the first form of force, supernaturalism, and all it implies, as a fit condition of the current reading of nature and the enforcement of its lessons upon the people. The second fact in this definition, nature, demands of the Liberal thinker devotion and truthfulness, the adoption of its lessons whether the result is pleasure or pain. It furnishes us with the facts, with the materials for rational use or abuse, as the case may be. This brings us to the third term in our definition of Liberalism. It is the use of nature under the guidance of deliberative actions in such a way as to force reformers amid the environments which the so-called supernaturalism has created. This is only done through a destructive warfare upon it. Now the question of constructive Liberalism comes in. If the terms of our definition are indorsed by more than one, then to the extent of that indorsement we might have incipient, constructive Liberalism, and the same will be true with any other definition.

There are no terms of unity in the light of which constructive Liberalism in the present status of Liberalism is a possibility. The first reason is a want of unity of thought as to its definition and the second reason comes of the fact that many of the Liberals have broken away from the bondage of creeded organizations, and are in constant dread of being caught again in that relation which might acquire supremacy over their liberty. And third, construction by implication means a formulated basis of action—and here again the same conjecture will arise as to the possible hazard of liberty. I am in favor of organization—when we arrive at that point when sufficient wisdom is at our command so that we can organize without a pope, creed, or formulated ideas. It will be seen, by those who are conversant with the history of Liberal thought, that the great mission of Liberalism is to do what it has done in the past, work hard amid great sacrifice, with the hope that those to come will reap the benefit. The Liberals of other ages went forth on this mission in the presence of the thumbscrew, rack, and the snapping crack of the fagot, but are traceable on the line of their march by the bloodstain of their bleeding feet on the rough, rocky way of their ascent, all through a desire to lighten up by truth the dark and dangerous way of superstition on the line of the supernatural. Though they have been doomed to a felon's cell, and death, they are to be remembered by the coming centuries through the popularity of the truths for which they were murdered. These truths were stolen by the church, which will swear by its trinity that they are the gift of the church to the world. If anything will tend to awaken a feeling that will invoke profanity as the only fit terms in which to express intolerable contempt, it is these acts of prayerful thievery, which the church is guilty of. This church which has murdered through many long centuries the brave men and women who have had the courage of their discoveries, and dared to proclaim the same in the night of Christian superstition, now claims those discoveries and truths as its own. It is still the mission of Liberalism to toil for the truth and if need be to suffer for it, knowing that when that truth gains recognition this old thievish church will steal it and claim it as its own gift to the world. If anything will make decency think damn, it is this infamous treason against those whom it has murdered, and those living whom this church would delight to treat in the same way if it could.

I doubt if it is in our power to change, at present, the work of Liberalism. It is ever an uncertain quantity, and is to-day what it was not yesterday, and herein we find its true philosophy. It is not an ism. As soon as it becomes such, we can readily see what must be the outcome. Constructive Liberalism will soon be an ism, and, in that event, it will become conservative, and that is on the down grade. It will soon demand a Christ, a Luther, a Wesley, and that will be the end of all progress. We note this fact in the history of the so-called heretics' churches. In this inception they were comparatively creedless—they were radical. Take Universalism and Unitarianism. The first demanded a better God than the old church had; Unitarianism demanded a better babyhood. They fought for their ideas, and hence they were persecuted by the old church, but the time came when the old church came up to the line with an improved God and babyhood; in the mean time these churches became only an ism, and there they remain as dead and as useless as it is possible to be. They have become conservative, and now the greatest boon that can be conferred upon them is to have the old church smile on them. "Shame, where is thy blush?" There is nothing in modern civilization that is more pitiable and contemptible than the position which Universalism and Unitarianism hold in relation to the old church. When orthodoxy has passed out of a belief in hell, Universalism and Unitarianism will have one. Such is the fate of an ism that is not founded in the old myth. Liberalism, even in its incipient organization, is showing the same fatal tendency—seeking to placate its natural enemies—seeking to become an ism it points on the time of conservatism. It, too, will demand a Luther, a Calvin, a Wesley. But be it remembered that Liberalism lies in the main outside of all attempts to make it popular through a claim to respectability. When respectability means less than the truth, the Liberals of this country can afford to do without it.

I claim that there is no respectability in treason against truth; no respectability in endeavoring to play the part of a sycophant that an enemy might smile on you. Your respectability is ever on the line of the courage of one's convictions and the love of the truth for truth's sake. To you there is only one line of action at present that has a promise—that is, on the line of organization—and that is political. I am of the opinion that this is the preëminent need of the present. Let the Liberals organize on a political basis, introducing the Nine Demands into the platform as far as need be. I think we could in this way secure a unity of action that would tell in the interest of the Liberals of this country, and also that of all of the people of this nation. I conceive it to be among the possibilities that such organization would in time ultimate in the attainment of a position which would hold the balance of power. I am of the opinion that such a party will in the near future command more than a million votes, and the Liberals of these United States can do more for the nation and for Liberalism than can be done in any other way, and if a convention in 1892 could be called for that purpose there is no doubt that it would constitute one of the most important gatherings ever met in this country. Here we run no risk in taking a leader, no bondage is likely to come from such an organization; we could rally around a standard-bearer as we cannot under constructive Liberalism. This is the way which to me has more promise than any other way to my imagination. J. H. BURNHAM.

W. F. JAMIESON:

What is Freethought?

Its affirmative side.

It embodies these principles as fundamental, binding on no one unless sanctioned by the individual conception of their truth.

1. Reason is our guide; nature our standard; truth our aim.

2. Eclecticism—acceptance of truth from any source.

3. Individual sovereignty.

4. There are valuable truths in all man-made book revelations.

5. The more moral and intellectual our lives, the greater will be our happiness.

6. There is a germ of goodness in human nature which refines, ennobles, and will finally save the race from all immoralities.

7. The scientific study of nature will insure to the mind knowledge, which will beget wisdom, and wisdom teaches cheerful obedience to natural law, resulting in health, happiness, and long life.

8. Evolution, the universal law of progress.

9. The domain of science is boundless as the universe, and science deals with matter and force, the visible and invisible.

10. The pursuit of truth for its own sake, and its application to the improvement of mankind, constitute the highest motives of human action.

11. Free thought, free speech, free press demand the interchange of ideas; "universal mental liberty;" "justice for all, privileges for none;" "promote the general welfare;" insure the brotherhood and sisterhood of the race.

12. "Hear both sides, then decide." Never decide until more than one side has been thoroughly studied. "Any system which shuns investigation openly manifests its own error."

Negative principles:

1. There is no proof of the existence of any of the pagan, Christian, or other gods.

2. No proof of the existence of a malignant fiend, adversary of man, a supernatural, personal devil.

3. No endless hell or place of torment.

4. No innate, nor total, depravity of man.

5. No vicarious atonement.

6. No physical resurrection from the dead.

7. No miracles in the sense of violations or infringements of natural law.

8. No special revelation from any god to man.

9. No special providence.

10. No positive proof that a man lives after he is dead.

The affirmative side, as I interpret Freethought, starts with Reason. Its book is Nature. Its grand aim is Truth. The principles which follow the first threefold statement naturally flow from it; have their source in it.

The second principle makes a sectarian Freethinker an impossibility, prompts him to shun dogmatism as a disease, and gives him, or her, "the freedom of the city" not only, but the freedom of the universe.

The third principle is the corner-stone of the American republic; makes every man a king in his own right, and every woman a queen in her right. Liberty, Equality, Fraternity their heritage.

Fifth and sixth, salvation from error, falsehood. Degradation is from within. Humanity must save itself. Its individual members must become self-savers, if ever saved.

Seventh. Freethought and science are inseparable companions. All that is scientific is cordially welcomed by Freethought, as expressed in all of the succeeding affirmative principles, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth.

The Freethinker lives to glorify the race, not to praise God. So, naturally, he formulates negative declarations. The negations are such as cause the "galled jade" of superstition to wince, and in her blind fury she imagines that the "negatives" of the Freethinker are all he has. She feels them the most. All that he "denies" and "doubts" are the very things which nobody has proved, unless it may be the last named, and on that the Materialistic Freethinker is still seeking light. Devils, Gods, hells, miracles, all supernaturalism, are brushed aside by Freethinkers. They are the cobweb follies of our ancestors, still retained by a few intelligent people, out of compliment, partly, to the ignorant past. The denials and doubts of Freethinkers are in obedience to common sense against baseless assumptions—sacred foolishness. Churches, Gods, devils, religions might cease to exist to-day and the Freethought movement would still advance with resistless force to educate and liberate. The things it denies are merely hindrances in its pathway of progress which will be ground to pumice.

The Freethinker's denial of "Christian morality," as embraced in the doctrine of "vicarious atonement," is a shot through the very heart of the system of Christianity itself. That doctrine is a millstone around the neck of Christianity. It is a contradiction of every moral precept which it borrowed. It perpetually offers a premium for the commission of crime. Human nature will be better, purer, nobler when Christianity ceases to exist—there will be one gigantic evil less to deal with. The gods and devils are dead. The dark shadow athwart our pathway is cast by those corpses—and that shadow is religion. Dust, ashes, shadows will disappear. There need be no apprehension that their destruction will be too sudden. While they continue, the atmosphere we breathe will be laden with poison.

Let every Freethinker shout his happy deliverance from the spider-trap of superstition.

Our London Letter.

An old suggestion has again seen the light in a recent number of the Guardian. An Oxford parson pleads therein for the publication of all "semi-Rationalistic" works in Latin, so that common people should not read them and get their faith shaken. I suppose wholly Rationalistic works should be printed in Greek or Arabic. But could there be a fuller admission of the utter rottenness of the buttresses supporting the Christian religion? This particular parson appears to be rather clearer-sighted than many of his brethren; and having probably read some of these objectionable works, can see that no satisfactory answers can be given to them, and therefore the only way to preserve the effete creed a while longer is to suppress such works as far as possible. It is a well-understood fact that the aristocracy of intellect no longer believe the old dogmas, though it is nothing to the credit of many of them that they still lend their support in a measure, and refrain from expressing their real opinions publicly. And if the more ignorant become equally enlightened, they will be more candid, with the result that the current creed will tumble ignominiously and speedily into the grave that has been so long ready to receive it.

A lively little passage of arms took place a few days back in the London county council on the suggestion of a reverend alderman to accord a reception to Mr. Stanley, the African explorer. On the face, it seems difficult to see what such a body has to do with such a matter, but the alderman evidently wanted a reputation for hospitality at the ratepayer's expense, but this pardonable ambition was promptly nipped in the bud by John Burns, of strike fame, who does not seem to hav been very far out in his estimate of the great explorer's character. It certainly did seem somewhat out of place for a minister of Christ to propose a public welcome to a man who does not hold his dusky brother's life at a great valuation.

The Record reports the finding of a manuscript of the New Testament dating from the middle of the fourth century in a Turkish library at Damascus, by the bishop of Nicomedia, who has previously made other equally valuable discoveries. It is further stated that the civilized world will await further particulars with extreme interest. But as the civilized world has not apparently become very excited over the matter, I dare say it will wait with patience until the bishop has more information to giv on the subject. But this discovery of ancient manuscripts proving the truth of the Bible fables is nearly played out, and no one takes much interest in these periodical reports.

The papal encyclical has fallen somewhat flat; people may read it as a matter of curiosity, and then throw it aside as they would any other item of news, and think no more about it. It is as well to hav such documents published occasionally, as it shows the power they once possessed is no longer in force, and their promulgation has not the slightest effect one way or the other.

Mr. Bradlaugh has returned from his Indian trip, and although he has benefited by the voyage, he does not appear to be thoroughly restored to his former state of health. He will undoubtedly hav to husband his resources of strength, which are not now so great as formerly, and though he will submit his resignation as president to the national Secular Society, it is understood he will by no means sever his connection with that body. He will find his parliamentary duties sufficiently heavy, without engaging in other activ work, and it behooves him to take care of a life, perhaps as valuable to others as himself.

CERTAINLY we do not need to be soothed and entertained always like children. He who resorts to the easy novel, because he is languid, does no better than if he took a nap. The front aspect of great thoughts can only be enjoyed by those who stand on the side whence they arrive. Books, not which afford us a cowering enjoyment, but in which each thought is of unusual daring; such as an idle man cannot read, and a timid one would not be entertained by, which even make us dangerous to existing institutions—such call I good books.—Thoreau.

THUS it is that a careful survey of history will prove that the Reformation made the most progress not in those countries where the people were most enlightened, but in those countries where, from political causes, the clergy were least able to withstand the people.—Buckle.

MEN hav a singular desire to be good without being good for anything, because, perchance, they think vaguely that so it will be good for them in the end.—Thoreau.

Ideal Materialism.

I believe that all phenomena are but the various manifestations of one universal force which is a property of hypothetical "matter" coeval with it, and that is eternal, inseparable from it; and that its personification is the God of nature who presides over the immutable laws of causation which direct and control all phenomena. I also believe that the planets of the solar system were at one time parts of the sun, whose rays in ages past stored the energy in the coal that we use at present, and we waste or lose a large portion of it in rendering the remainder available. The sun evaporates the water that supplies the streams, and produces the winds that carry it to the highlands and mountains from whence it returns to the seas, expending in various ways along its course the same amount of energy the sun expended in raising it. Its rays impart their energy to vegetable life, which could not exist without them, and this sustains animal life.

If the opinion I hav expressed regarding the origin of the planets is correct, the sun is indirectly and otherwise the only source of power in the solar system. It certainly runs all the machinery in the world, winds our watches, moves our bodies, and actuates our thoughts. And as far as our solar system is concerned, it seems to do everything. If we consider our planetary system alone, the sun appears to be the embodiment of the personification of force, that I hav called the God of nature. But the sun can create nothing. Who or what created matter then? I deny that matter really exists and claim that our senses—which advise us of all that of which we hav knowledge or evidence—are themselvs incapable of taking cognizance of matter as an actual entity, but these merely recognize immaterial properties which are called phenomena and ascribed to matter. If I examin a piece of brass, as an illustration, I discover it is capable of making an impression on each of my personal senses. I observe it bears a golden color, but this is not matter, and in absolute darkness all things are black—in other words, without color whatever. I also see it has a certain shape, and it is of a definit size. These impressions are confirmed by my sense of touch, which informs me further the metal is hard, and that when I press against it it resists my touch with equal force, thus demonstrating the proposition that action and reaction are equal and opposit. This sense also givs me some knowledge of its weight. But size and form and hardness are not matter, nor is weight or resistance matter.

It may be objected that only absolute matter can hav actual weight, but as the mass and size invariably accompany any matter, I may claim that properties like these hav weight, which itself is an immaterial attraction, and such qualities as color are imponderable phenomena, as an object weighs no more in the light which shows its color than in perfect darkness which deprives it of all color. The sense of sight itself is an immaterial perception produced by the reflection of an object on a "sight center" which corresponds with the expanded terminal of one of the filaments of the optic nerve. If I strike the piece of brass that is under examination I find it is thrown into vibration and these movements being communicated to the atmosphere or other medium are conveyed to the tympanum and converted into sound by the auditory nerve and its accessory apparatus. This is purely a local phenomenon that, like the sense of sight, only exists in the mind whose organization creates it. The trees fall in silence in an abandoned forest and the waves break in silence on the uninhabited rocks of the ocean. The sense of taste comprises the sensations produced by certain substances coming in contact with special nerves, and it is thought that in a like manner minute particles of odoriferous bodies being brought in contact with the olfactory nerve occasions the sense of smell. The sensations attributable to these senses inform us that brass has a "metallic" taste and a peculiar odor. But sensation is not matter. Therefore we find the piece of brass we hav analyzed, and would naturally pronounce matter, is really the sum of its qualities and equal to this equation: A certain form plus a certain size plus a certain color plus (a certain hardness = a certain resistance) plus a certain weight plus a certain vibration plus a certain taste plus a certain odor = the piece of brass, just as meats plus potatoes plus seasonings = hash, or self-interest plus brutality = the instinctiv character of the New Yorkers, or five plus ten plus five hundred plus one = five hundred sixteen = V plus X plus D plus I = DXVI = 5 plus 10 plus 500 plus 1 = 516. We do not compute signs or symbols but we compute the ideas that these signs and symbols represent. I submit the following proposition as an axiom of "qualitativ mathematics." The qualities that are common to all the properties added belong to their sum. Now, as all properties are immaterial like those of the piece of brass which we hav analyzed, it follows that their sum cannot be a material quantity. The relations of abstract properties which cannot "be measured" are not usually considered susceptible of a mathematical demonstration, but if the actual values of their qualities are not known, these may be given practical values, and be computed by the ordinary rules of mathematics and in accordance with special axioms. I state in illustration: that which promotes plessure may be regarded as good and all that causes sorrow considered evil, but I know of nothing that under this construction is wholly good or entirely evil. Thus we may regard the use of alcoholic liquors in general as productiv of ten times as much evil as good and as one part good and nine parts evil, and when we subtract the good from the evil, we find it as a whole is an evil, for plus good minus – 9 = 10 evil = the whole.

Most persons realize that the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage is a national evil, and but few of these wish this acknowledged evil suppressed by law. Laws seem to be violated in inverse proportion to the squares of the severity of their penalties. The illustrations I hav given explain what I mean by "qualitativ mathematics." I now make a few special observations on the personal senses. These immaterial agencies in their normal state apprise us of the properties that exist within their range of action by converting the impressions received from external sources into the sensible manifestations of sight, sound, touch, taste, and odor. But phenomena are not dependent on external impressions alone, for the senses are manifested in trance and sleep, and the mind discerns with great clearness the differences between these actual manifestations and the mere remembrance or recollection of them. Augustine relates that Gennadius, a Carthaginian physician, was convinced of the immortality of the soul by a dream in which he saw a young man who reasoned with him on the subject, arguing that as he could see when his bodily eyes were closed in sleep, so he would find when his bodily senses were extinct in death he would see, hear, and feel with the senses of his spirit. In sleep we see views that do not exist, hear language that is not uttered, and touch, taste, and smell things that are not. Yet these conceptions are as real to us as the external impressions that are sometimes incorporated into our dreams or the perceptions of our wakeful hours. This seems to confirm the theory I am advocating, which is that the mind is an actual entity which creates its own environment in accordance with external impressions and physiological conditions and influences.

As phenomena are not themselvs matter, the latter is but a hypothesis which is designed expressly for the purpose of explaining the former. A hypothesis is not matter. It simply is a plausible theory which may be demonstrated but cannot be proved. The ancients believed the sun revolved once around the earth in each period of twenty-four hours. They may hav said, "The apparent place of the sun twenty-four hours ago was where it is now and will be again twenty-four hours later, and this demonstrates our theory." The newer theory that the earth turns once around in twenty-four hours is also compatible with the demonstration. I deny that matter is an actual entity, grant it is a hypothetical one, and concede that a hypothetical entity is a practical one. Therefore phenomena follow each other in the same order of succession that would be the case if matter were an actual entity. As a hypothetical entity it was not created, as a practical one it cannot be annihilated. We may infer by analogy that which can not be destroyed could not hav been created. That which has a commencement must find an end, but that which has no beginning may never end. Some things seem complex solely because of their extreme simplicity. Newton the eminent astronomer could not bridle his horse, but Alexander loosed the Gordian knot (which had puzzled several generations) by the simple process of cutting it. In speculating on probabilities or contemplating the infinit, one is apt to overlook an axiom in seeking or anticipating a more complex solution to the problem under consideration. What is more simple than to infer that matter in its comprehensiv sense has always existed in some form, and it must always continue its natural course in forms of ever-changing identity; that it is like space and time, eternal and infinit?

Let us endeavor to comprehend this aspect by comparing it with the following similitude. The present seems the continuation of the eternal past, and the future the everlasting prolongation of the present, and this analogy applies to space and matter. I believe the universe has neither center nor limit, and could I proceed from any point in a straight line forever I would encounter space and matter eternally.

It is less difficult to comprehend the infinitude of matter, space, and time, than to conceive of their originations or their terminations. On the other hand, if matter in its comprehensiv sense was created by a material agency, its creator must be the subject of natural laws, and as eternal change is the order of all forms of matter, he could not preserve his identity eternally. If the "creator" is an immaterial agency, he possesses none of the attributes ascribed to matter, and he is not perceptible to our senses or comprehensible to our minds. As we must necessarily admit the eternal existence of some entity, it seems to me more logical, for the reasons I hav stated, to grant the eternal existence of matter, its natural laws and their phenomena, than to assume that an eternal and incomprehensible abstraction has created something from nothing, endowed the creation with the immutable laws that govern all its manifestations, and passed from an activ deity to an honorary one. Matter is something—in our minds—and it is an axiom that something cannot be made from nothing. If matter was not created it has always existed, and it never had a cause and it is not an effect. A cause must precede an effect, and an effect must hav its antecedent cause. If a deity has always existed it seems an instance of his good luck, so to speak. I think the animal kingdom was evolved by nature from the vegetable one, and the latter is a production of the mineral one. There never has been a line drawn between the animal kingdom and the vegetable one. They blend in insensible graduations in many instances. Plants and animals hav many features in common, including respiratory and circulatory systems and the sexual distinctions. There are certain species which are not classified as belonging to either of these kingdoms exclusivly, because they are unquestionably members of both. It occurs to me, in this connection, that the hair is a vegetable growth, since it possesses life without sensation, and often grows luxuriantly after death until the scalp, its soil, is impoverished. It seems a significant fact that we derive our sustenance through the same progressiv order of the three kingdoms that I hav delineated.

Life is the competitiv struggle of each individual for subsistence and of every species for existence. Plants and animals increase in a geometrical ratio, and hav done so for thousands of ages.

This process has populated the earth, the air, and the water to repletion, and it now keeps the quantity of life, or life considered as a whole, at its maximum. As an increase in one kingdom necessitates a diminution in one or both the others, so does the increase of one species involve the decrease of others. We cannot breathe, walk, eat, or drink without destroying animal life. We kill the insects that would consume our crops for their own preservation, to our impoverishment, and kindness to our species is cruelty to theirs. We slay animals for food, and their energy, which was derived from the sun originally and has worked changes in the two inferior kingdoms before it reached our own, reverts to us and moves our brains and bodies. The stronger of individuals and species throughout nature prey upon the weaker ones, and only raise themselvs by mounting on those they crush beneath them, in the struggle for life and the survival of the "fittest." This much for nature, her "God," and his equity. I regard man as a part of nature, a manifestation of "matter," and the subject of its laws. These can never perfect his adaptation to an ever-changing environment, but they may yet improve his character, and eliminate its selfishness to such an extent that he will subvert the usual order of nature sufficiently to at last treat the individual of his own species with justice and beneficence. This much for man.

JULIAN MARCELLAS.

My Say About the Pictures.

As Moses was inspired to write an account of his own death and burial, so I hav been inspired to write about the pictures. I had made up my mind that I could stand THE TRUTH SEEKER at least a little while longer with or without the pictures, and that I would hav no hand in the controversy.

But I had a dream the other night, and dreamed that if I did not write about the pictures they would be discontinued, THE TRUTH SEEKER stopped, and Freethought would get a set-back. Dreams are not to be passed over lightly, and this settled the matter at once, as the dream of Joseph settled the godship of Jesus.

I dreamed a dream the other night
When all around was still;
I dreamed I seed Susanna dear
A-comin' down de hill.
She had de hoe-cake in her mouth,
A tear was in her eye;
Says I, my dear, I'm from de South,
Susanna, don't you cry.

Now, suppose we had sixty or seventy thousand men in this country whose business it was to make the people believe the above lines were inspired. And suppose they should succeed in making nine out of ten believe it, would we be bound to treat those men with a great deal of deference?

But there is a great deal of holy slush crammed down the throats of the people by the priesthood as inspired which is just as foolish as the above lines are. If these lines are shockingly silly, they hav the merit of not being shockingly indecent, and that is more than can be said for much of the mental garbage which is devoured because the people are made to believe that it was written by divine dictation.

The men who are engaged in teaching this nonsense are not only holding the world to a standstill, but are absolutely striving to drive the people back to an age of superstition and ignorance, when it was believed that people could rise up out of the grave and the planets could be stopped in their courses.

For thousands of years there has been a class of men whose object has been to engraft the most horrible superstitions upon the minds of the people. They hav never been the promoters of science. They hav never tried to better the condition of men in this life, but hav ever directed the mind to barren regions beyond the clouds. They hav never investigated the laws of nature, from the fact that their God was the cause of every phenomenon, and there was no inducement to scientific research.

There has been another class of men, small in number, who hav ignored the miraculous, and who hav been the most patient toilers for the world's good, and who hav tried to account through the laws of nature for all the phenomena which we behold.

Between these two classes there has been a perpetual warfare. All who hav differed from the advocates of superstition hav been denominated Infidels, with whom they believed their God was always angry, and whom he would consign to everlasting punishment. There never has been and never can be a compromise.

The advocates of superstition hav always resorted to the most cruel and desperate measures and taken every mean advantage. They hav never hesitated at any measure which would redound to their interest if it could be accomplished by lying or deceit.

Then why should we be afraid of offending them? Why attempt to inveigle them into our camp when they are ever on the alert to giv us a fatal stab? Any attempt to cultivate fraternal feelings with them will end as disastrously as for the lamb to fraternize with the wolf. There is no natural affinity. They are our sworn enemies. Even a careless perusal of the Christian papers of the country ought to satisfy any mind that they observe no honorable rule of warfare, but lie in wait for us like a beast of prey.

I hold nothing in common with believers in God-written books. Their tendency is to block the wheels of progress, and hold us back to the usages and ignorance of the people from whom they originated. Talmage says we want to get back into the "old paths." The very best men they could boast in old Bible times would be bad men to day. Then to think of the morals of the man "after God's own heart!" Whew! There can be no wider difference between two classes of men than exists between Christians and Liberals. We are actually traveling in opposit directions. They are trying to lead the people back to the ignorance and barbarism of three thousand years ago, and the Liberals are pressing forward to a higher civilization.

The people of to-day are a hundred times better qualified to write a Bible than the writers who produced the holy mumble.

The truth is, the combined wisdom of the world could not write a book every way suited to the needs of the people a thousand years hence.

With these facts before our eyes, is it not the hight of folly to seek to establish anything like a union between Liberals and Christians?

I am in open hostility to the whole Christian scheme, and I would treat Christians just as I would any other public enemy. Wherever and whenever I can strike a blow that will weaken their influence, with whatever weapon, that blow will be struck.

Liberals may differ in regards to methods as they differ about other matters, but when it comes to shaping things to suit Christians then I lose my stomach.

There seems to be a disposition manifested on the part of some to carry on the Liberal work in a sort of pious way so as not to offend Christians. But I tell you there is no half-way house where Liberals and Christians can meet and indorse each other's plans. The attempt is just as foolish as to try to weld a piece of cast steel to an icicle.

"My voice is still for war—"an open war and a fair fight.

The men who hav been the boldest and most outspoken hav exerted the most and best influence.

It was said that Bennett said many things which hurt. I guess they did, for he was a perfect Hercules, and when a stone went whizzing from his sling there was always a dead man in the enemy's camp. No man in his time did more to popularize Freethought, and no man dealt more unsparingly with the old superstition. Not even prison bars could divert him from his purpose.

I am in favor of any measure which has a tendency to uproot the old superstition and destroy the confidence of the people in the holy blab as an inspired book.

Can any man in his sober senses believe that Heston's pictures hav not had a tendency to weaken the faith of the people in regard to the inspiration of the old Jewish scrap-book? It is said that they "repel" more than they "attract." But whom do they repel? Not the friends, but the enemies of our cause.

Why this squeamishness in regard to the pictures? Simply because Liberals hav not yet got entirely clear of the slime of the old superstition—and hav still a sort of holy horror of ridiculing what Christians regard as sacred things. Heston has a rare gift, and is turning his talent to good account. To him much has been given, and from him much has been received. Every man must work according to his talent, but men of narrow views will insist that everyone must work as they work.

I hav many a hearty laugh over some of Heston's grotesque conceptions. In showing some of Heston's decided hits, I hav remarked, "Heston has dropped a cannon ball through another cobweb of the old superstition."

It is no use for a Christian to try to look solemn; some of the pictures will make a dried mummy laugh right out, and I tell you a Christian is in a bad way when he is an unwilling laugher. Let the grave say what they will, there is nothing which will make a man catch breath like well-directed and well-merited ridicule.

I am informed that Horace Greeley admitted to a friend, after being defeated in the canvass for the presidency, that the cartoons of Nast did more to defeat him than any other measure adopted by his opponents.

But it is said that Heston's pictures are blasphemous. As late as the sixteenth century, everything was blasphemous that did not please the Christians. Two hundred years ago every Christian would hav expected the wrath of God to fall upon the designer of such pictures, and everyone would hav wanted to enjoy the luxury of dipping the tip of his finger at least in his heart's blood.

The reason why Heston's pictures are blasphemous is because they go like a hot iron into the very heart of the priesthood and the old superstition.

There seems to be a sort of sickly disposition manifested on the part of some who claim to be Liberal to run Freethought papers in some unknown and mysterious way so as to please Christians. But it is an impossibility. As well try to make the law of gravitation attract and repel at the same time. The ox and the ass can never work in the same yoke.

Continue the pictures—hew to the line. If the chips fly in the teeth of Christians, let them stand out of the way. Do their papers boom our cause to any great extent? In what way hav they laid us under obligations to them, so that we are bound to season our mental food to suit their tastes?

What kind of a Freethought paper would it be, so conducted as to "attract" and not offend Christians? Or what kind of a battle would we fight if we allowed the cohorts of Christianity to officer our army? If Christians had the power they would blot out every Freethought paper in the land.

With a little persuasion perhaps we might induce them to open our conventions with prayer. And then they might "lend a hand" in conducting our papers. And then it might be policy to hav each one of our public speakers go to Talmage or some other eminent divine, and hav him recast his or her lectures so that they will not "repel" Christians. When all this is accomplished we shall be in condition to "move on the enemy's works."

A boy saw a mule by the roadside once and made up his mind that he would make the mule get out of his way. So he sneaked up and kicked him behind, and the mule sent him back about twenty feet rolling in the dust. The boy got up and measured the distance between him and the mule, and exclaimed: "Is it possible that I kicked that mule as far as that?" Now when we hav made the above concessions, and do nothing and say nothing to "repel" or offend the hidebound devotees of the old superstition, we shall hav kicked the old Christian mule further than the boy did with about the same result. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since its first inception, therefore it will be inferred that I take great interest in that paper. And I would hav it pursue the same aggressiv policy which has hitherto characterized it.

I would not say that it is the best Freethought paper in the world, but I will say that I believe that it has convinced more men and women of the error of their ways and given them the courage to stand up and be counted than any other paper with which I am acquainted.

The reason is, it has been bold and outspoken and called things by their proper names, and never has looked up to see whether Mrs. Grundy frowned or smiled.

I hav never said as much about THE TRUTH SEEKER before, for somehow it seemed to me like boasting of good traits in my own family.

Now I hav given some pointers in regard to the pictures. No Liberal is bound by what I say, only so far as my suggestions look reasonable. I would say to every Liberal, if you do not like my plan, work out a plan of your own, but keep to work until the old superstition shall giv way to sense and science, and the ecclesiastical yoke shall be lifted from the shoulders of the people. Christianity and Rationalism.

One flourishes best among the most ignorant and credulous, the other among the most enlightened and critical.

One believes in the mystical, ancient, miraculous, and the actuality of the impossible; the other believes in all that can be proved real in the past and present, and what reasonably may be in the future.

One says, Believe or be burnt and be damned; the other says, Be honest, believe when convinced, and do what you think is right.

One is full of other-worldliness, the other attends strictly to the world he now livs on.

One hopes for happiness in heaven; the other tries to earn and make happiness and heaven here.

One teaches that though you are ever so great a sinner, you may, by an act of faith in a creed, transfer all your guilt to the back of an innocent Jesus, and enjoy eternal bliss forever after death; the other teaches that he doubles his iniquity who accepts pardon by the sufferings of an innocent person in his stead.

One teaches that we are all totally lost and depraved, and that only the power of God can make us saints; the other believes that all our faculties are good and useful, and that we should take care lest we demoralize ourselvs.

One tries to destroy confidence in man and establish confidence [faith] in God; the other tries to destroy faith in God and establish confidence among men.

One believes that confidence [faith] in what you do not understand is the highest of virtues; the other thinks that it is better to limit your confidence to what you do understand and know something about.

One says we ought to walk and see by confidence [faith]; the other says we would better open our eyes and look before we leap.

One hopes to be happy by and by by loving and serving a God he has not seen; the other is happy now by loving and serving some one he has seen and who can be benefited by his love and help. One tries to fit people for another world; the other tries to make them better fit to liv in this one. One does not want God to see him doing wrong; the other does not want to see himself in wrong-doing.

One hopes to escape just punishment and receive a reward by and by; the other expects to reap just what he sows, and wants to earn and get all his rewards here and now.

One persecutes for opinion's sake; the other only asks for justice and fair play, and givs to all every privilege and right it asks for itself.

One is very aggressiv; the other is only defensiv and progressiv.

One invented implements of torture, holy water, holy candles, crucifixes, altars, pulpits, ceremonies, creeds, imaginary crimes, witches, ghosts, a devil, a God, a heaven, and a hell. The other has given us our civilization and all the sciences; the steam-engin, telegraph, telephone, sewing-machine, and all the other useful inventions.

To one death is the king of terrors; to the other

> It is a last, a long, a beautiful rest,
> When all sorrow is past from the brow and the breast.

The Christian hates and slanders the Rationalist, and the Rationalist smiles and pities the poor Christian. PROF. C. L HASKELL, Ex-Christian.

The Story of Lot's Wife.

The question which a religious oriental put to himself in ancient times at Usdum, says Prof. Andrew D. White in the Popular Science Monthly, was substantially that which his descendant to-day puts to himself at Kosseir: "Why is this region thus blasted?"—"whence these pillars of salt?" or "whence these blocks of granit?"—"what aroused the vengeance of Jehovah or of Allah to work these miracles of desolation?"

And, just as Maxime du Camp recorded the answer of the modern Shemite at Kosseir, so the compilers of the Jewish sacred books recorded the answer of the ancient Shemite at the Dead sea; just as Allah at Kosseir blasted the land and transformed the melons into bowlders which are seen to this day, so Jehovah at Usdom blasted the land and transformed Lot's wife into a pillar of salt which is seen to this day.

No more difficulty was encountered in the formation of the Lot legend, to account for that rock resembling the human form, than in the formation of the Niobe legend, which accounted for a supposed human resemblance in the rock at Sipylos; it grew up just as we hav seen thousands of similar myths and legends grow up about striking natural appearances in every home of the human race. Being thus consonant with the universal view regarding the relation of physical geography to the divine government, it became a treasure of the Jewish nation and of the Christian church, a treasure not only to be guarded against all hostil intrusion, but to be increased, as we shall see, by the myth-making powers of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans for thousands of years.

The Bible and the Character of God Indefensible.

At the recent meeting of the New York Presbytery, in the discussion over the proposed revision of the Confession of Faith, the Rev. D. G. Wylie said: "Mr. Ingersoll has been quoted in this debate. We are to giv up the Confession, because we cannot answer his arguments against the doctrins of the Confession. Can we answer his arguments against the Bible and the character of God? If we cannot, shall we giv up the scriptures and God? The arguments of Infidels cannot be answered on the grounds of pure reason." That is a pretty frank admission that the Bible and the character of God as therein portrayed are indefensible. And it is also one of the best arguments in favor of revising the Confession, because the Confession follows the lines of the Bible and is a logical statement of what God is and will do, if the Bible be true. The Confession is altogether too biblical for this age, and most intelligent Presbyterians know it. It is a formula of doctrin too horrible to teach, and one which one-half of the Presbyterians at least do not believe.

But, nevertheless, the old Calvinism is strictly biblical and is the only logical one of the many Christian creeds. The doctrin of God's sovereignty —his omniscience and omnipotence—leads directly to the doctrin of election, and reprobation is the inevitable corollary of election. If God knew all things from all eternity he knew just how many people the whole world would hav, and which of them were to be saved, and which of them reprobated to eternal misery. He knew the ones he would pass by and the ones he would call. To doubt this is to doubt his omniscience. Salvation under these circumstances is not a matter of choice, but of foreordination. As Dr. Patton of Princeton puts it, "the Confession teaches that only the elect will be saved; that those of the elect who are capable of faith are saved by faith; that others of the elect, such as elect infants, are saved without faith. Calvinism teaches that God elects individuals to eternal life out of his mere good pleasure. Now, if men are saved because they are elected, and God elects some, certainly some must be left. We may say that God passed them by, or reprobated them, or did not save them."

These are perfectly logical conclusions from the premises laid down of God's omniscience and sovereignty, and when the Calvinists depart from them and adopt others, the new ones must be, as Dr. Buckley says, but simply a coating of sugar laid over the theological pills, which they find bitter in the mouth, but which thorough-going, old-fashioned Calvinists maintain hav a marvelously beneficial effect upon the health and soundness of the system. It is the fact that the bitterness of these pills is gathered directly from the Bible that makes Dr. Wylie's statement that Infidels cannot be answered by pure reason such a boomerang to the inspired word.

The Roman Church's Lament.

The Roman Catholic journals apparently hav arrived at the conclusion that Brazil will follow in the footsteps of France and Italy, and that its new government will not be subservient to the church. The Review, the most important Roman Catholic weekly journal published in this country, has found out that the "tendency of the age" is to "suppress" Roman Catholicism, and thus laments the change of government in Brazil:

"We hav not the slightest doubt that that fair and hitherto peaceful and prosperous country is at this moment ruled by an ambitious junto whose object is not the good of the country, but first, personal wealth and aggrandizement, and second, the suppression of the Catholic religion. That is the tendency of the age, and the results are generally brought about through the agencies of European Masonry. They and their brethren in South America are Infidels and Atheists, and they hate the Catholic church because it puts restraint upon the passions of men and denounces iniquity in every shape. When they gain power their first principle of action is to 'look out for No. 1.' It was so in Ecuador when the admirable Moreno was assassinated, a martyr to religion and good government, by the agency of that all-powerful and unscrupulous secret society. It is so in France and in Italy at the present time when an Infidel minority, through the secret machinations of this same dangerous organization, tyrannizes over the consciences of the people in the name of liberty, and grows enormously rich while the people are heavily taxed, and in Italy at least ground down to the very last point of endurance. It was so in Belgium, until a few years ago the people rose in their might and thrust the wicked intruders from power."

The Review goes on to outline the course probably to be pursued by the Brazilian republicans. They will, it says, represent the church as opposed to free government, and persecute accordingly. The revenues of the church will be seized for "more careful administration;" the ecclesiastical property will be confiscated, probably the bishops will be banished; the schools will be made secular and godless, and everything arranged on the most "Liberal" and "unsectarian" plans. "And the rest of the world," it sneeringly remarks, "will applaud, or if they do not openly approve, they will look on with indifference as if they had no interest whatever in the matter."

It is undoubtedly true, in this century, that when Catholic populations change their forms of government and swing away from the church, the intelligent among them do not stop at Protestantism, but go over to Freethought, esteeming no one religion above another, but all alike, as but steps in the mental evolution of mankind. And if the Catholic church shall be represented as the opposer of free government, that view of it is but the truth, and amply justified by fact. Why, it was only the other day that a daily journal in sympathy with Catholicism warned the king of Italy that the chief stay of kingly government is the Catholic church—that her authority kept the people in subjection by teaching them the "divine right of kings!" And it may become a question of confiscating all the property of the church, to prevent the church confiscating all the property of the people. Other nations hav been forced to pursue this course, and even an emperor of Brazil once found the order of Christ too powerful for the good of his country, and had to take the tithe collection into his own hands, and pay the priests himself, else would the church hav owned the country. But it is not confiscation: it is restitution. The church has ever been so greedy, so unscrupulous, so despotic, that to defend their existence nations hav been forced to make pecuniary war upon her. The blame is upon the church, not upon the governments.

If the Catholic authorities and writers would but stop to think why the tendency of the age is to suppress political Catholicism, and would be honest in their thinking, they would be astonished not at the suppression but that it has been so long delayed. They would know that it is the tyranny of Rome, the machinations of the Jesuits, the Inquisition, the rack, the thumbscrew, the prison, the Auto da-fé, which they profess to regard as only the "rigmarole of anti-popery lingo," which hav taught all intelligent nations to beware of the Roman church.

Conformity to Nature's Laws.

A person that takes up a Freethought book or paper finds that an expression that recurs with much frequency is, "Conform to nature's laws." Everywhere, in varying phrase, he finds this exhortation, to cast off supernatural direction and find out nature's laws and obey them. One who was new to Rationalistic thought might not at once receive from this precept the whole of its import, the whole of the impression that it is capable of conveying. He might think to himself that the finding out of nature's laws and conforming to them was nothing more than what the Christians around him were doing; that we all do about alike and liv about alike in that matter, and that he could see no considerable difference between Christians and Freethinkers in that respect. It is to a person thinking thus that we desire to make things more clear.

What is meant when we say that we should find out the laws of nature, is that everything in the universe proceeds in a fixed and sure order of succession, a certain event following, at all times and places, a certain cause; and such being the case, we should discover just what causes produce just what events, and then we can by bringing about the cause of any desirable event, also bring about that desirable event. The expression, "laws of nature," is not strictly correct, since there is no "law" enacted and imposed by any being, as is a human law; what is meant is, order of succession. It is seen at once that our happiness must be great or less just in proportion to the extent to which we can investigate events and bring their orders of succession under the classifications of science. This is what science is—an organized body of observations as to the relations in which events occur. And this, science, is what Freethinkers champion, and recommend, and advance.

Now let us turn to the other side. What is Christianity? At the very start, in the very defining of Christianity, we find that it is a thing antagonistically opposit to that system that affirms an invariable order of events in the universe, and counsels us to seek that order out. For the inmost essence of Christianity is, an affirmation that events do not proceed in an invariable order, but in obeyance to the varying will of a supernatural being. Christianity affirms that this being has repeatedly broken the order of events, and that he will do so now at the instance of any one of our race that prays in faith.

Wherever and whenever Christianity is fully and realizingly believed, this doctrin, that we may change the course of events by prayer, works many disastrous results. It does much harm now, especially in the Roman Catholic lands where all pray, tell beads, and mind priests, and no one studies books or observes nature to discover the actual nature of the universe he livs in. To-day in Spain scientific preventivs of contagion are little known and used, and epidemics are combated with ecclesiastical processions and extra contributions to priests' purses. In our land the faith curers are an example. But it is not, after all, to the striking instance that these faith healers afford, that we are to turn to obtain an estimate of the evil now worked by the doctrin of the supernatural order of things. The few deaths caused by these people are as nothing to the numbers that are not charged against the supernatural belief, but are really imputable to it. Were the human mind not choked to-day in its strivings for truth; were it not oppressed in colleges with fatal burdens of antiquated methods and totally worthless theological studies, and were it not everywhere perverted or distracted or intimidated by the threatenings of popular religious opinion, advances could be made, and would now hav been made, that would so extend our control over health and disease as to preserve tens of thousands of lives now lost. And, but for that Christian retardation, advances, equally great, made in fields of knowledge not alone physical but mental and moral—for all are under law—would now be giving us a world freed of half its present criminals, present prisoners, present strife, present ills of every complexion.

Just to the extent to which a so-called Christian of the present is seen to pray for things instead of working for them, we are to regard him as a true disciple of Christianity. Just to the extent to which he is seen to study, to learn, to devise, to work—that is, to find out the laws of nature and conform to them—we are to pronounce him unfaithful to Christianity, and a Freethinker and Rationalist.

A Woman Suffrage Convention.

We desire to call attention to a convention that is to be held at Washington, D. C., in Willard Hall (adjoining Willard's Hotel), on the 24th and 25th of February. The purpose is the uniting in a national organization of those women throughout the country that champion woman suffrage and are advanced in other progressiv thought as well. Nearly all the states will send delegates, and among the representativs will be many ladies known to our readers as bright and faithful Freethought workers. Among these are Helen H. Gardener, New York; Susan H. Wixon, Massachusetts; Voltairine de Cleyre, Pennsylvania; Etta D. Kelso, Californis, and Nora M. Remsburg, Kansas. The convention will be addressed by most, and we hope all, of the foregoing, and by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and other practiced speakers. Gentlemen, too, will add their efforts, and among those who will address the gathering are Prof. Elliott Cones, of Washington, and Mr. W. F. Aldrich, of Alabama. Any who desire more detailed information, or wish to contribute financially, may address Matilda Joslyn Gage, Fayetteville, N. Y.

This movement takes its rise from the fact that the existing woman suffrage societies hav fallen too much under church influence. We all know what is the result when any cause is allowed to come under the sway of the clergy. We know what physical science was when the church overswayed it. We know what was the complexion of political science when under ecclesiastical direction. If in their control of thought on those parts of political science that investigate men's rights and liberties the churches hav ever helped despotism and repressed the right and the true, so we may expect that in their influence upon this part of political science that considers women's rights they will promote despotism and repress the right and the true. From the church no good can come. When we see under its domination anything, of whatever nature, for which we hav any regard, we should endeavor its removal and rescue.

Editorial Notes.

THE annual crop of lies about Thomas Paine—which ripen January 29th—is now coming into market. The crop is precisely like that of last year, and of every year, but if a prize were offered for the biggest product it would hav to be awarded to the lie about Paine's "recantation." Liberals need pay little attention to these old slanders of Paine, but if they do desire information regarding Paine's last days, they should purchase "Paine Vindicated" by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

MR. WM. HART'S book, "The Candle from Under the Bushel," has been a source of much worriment to the saints of Kirksville, Mo., where Mr. Hart keeps a jewelry store. A Rev. Mr. Browder has published in a church paper printed in a neighboring town a series of long reviews of the book—the paper refusing, of course, to admit any replies from Mr. Hart—and Mr. Hart has now offered him $50 to read the book and review it from the pulpit before his congregation. In making this offer, the author of the book says: "This is my final and highest offer. Brother Browder has advertised my book in this place more than I hav myself, and thereby aided its circulation, and if the book is a mass of evil as he asserts, it behooves him as a Christian to counteract the evil influence he has set in motion by grinding it to powder." But Brother Browder will do nothing of the sort.

THE Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Republic writes this home to his paper: The clubs here are laughing over a remark attributed to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll that this administration reminded him of a dispute between a man and his wife as to what they would hav for their Christmas dinner. The man wanted turkey and the woman demanded duck, so they compromised on cabbage. "I told Mr. Harrison the other day," the colonel is quoted as saying, "what I thought of his way of running things. He has been wasting the people's time in examining into the claims of every applicant for place from cabinet secretaries down to doorkeepers. He has been in the office more than ten months now, and he is still worrying over some of those cases that were laid before him the day he entered the White House. The longer he waits the more applicants arise, and when there are twenty applicants for one place the effect of his final decision is to make nineteen enemies and one friend. And what a friend that one is! Why, a neighbor of mine who was among the first applicants for a certain office was kept waiting so long that he finally forgot all about it. The other morning I met him on the street and he called out: 'What news do you suppose I got to-day? That d—— fool Harrison has appointed me.' When I told the story to the president he inquired solemnly: 'Colonel Ingersoll, who was that man?' 'Mr. president,' I replied, 'you don't need to hav me tell you. You've appointed a couple of thousand men, more or less, to office. Just think them over and make a guess—you can't fail to hit the right one.'"

WHAT is called the most remarkable schism which has ever taken place in St. Louis, Mo., is the split in the wealthy Central church. A month or six weeks ago the pastor, Rev. R. C. Cave, created a sensation by delivering a sermon in which he said that he did not believe in the inspiration of the Bible or the divinity of Christ. He believed in Christ the man and in a God, but not the God of the Bible. The sermon divided the church, and about half the congregation withdrew while the other half passed resolutions indorsing Dr. Cave. He then resigned, but his friends in the congregation refused to accept his resignation and at a meeting pledged $50,000 to build a new church. Dr. Cave reconsidered his resignation. All the Christian ministers of every denomination and creed in all parts of the United States began denouncing him. His congregation met in a hall and there Dr. Cave said he had been read out of the church. He was not a Christian and did not believe in the divinity of Christ or the miracles or other things. He said he desired to retire from the pulpit, but the congregation passed a resolution setting forth that they did not believe any more than their pastor, and they desired to cut loose entirely from the Christians.

IN a speech at the celebration of the Centenary of the United States Judiciary, held in this city last week, Chauncey M. Depew said: "On every occasion the orator points with pride to the subject of the hour. To-day every speaker has pointed with pride, a pride shared by every human being in the United States, to our Federal Judicial system. But there is one period of our history as a people to which we do not point with pride. The first one hundred years of the Puritan commonwealth in New England had no clients, and therefore no lawyers. The clergy were the court for the settlement of all disputes, and the people their own advocates. During that period they banished Baptists and imprisoned Quakers for conscience's sake and committed judicial murder by hanging witches. This is a period for which we are ever apologizing. It demonstrates that the gospel without the law cannot run a republic. Had there been a fearless bar and independent judiciary the client's retainer would hav inspired the lawyers to so present the inalienable rights under religious liberty that Roger Williams would never hav migrated, and the Quaker would hav worshiped as he thought God told him to, while the witch would hav exercised no other fascination than the one she has always exhibited in all ages of the world toward our weaker sex." There is a good deal of hard sense in these remarks, more than in the one by the minister who responded to the toast, "The Bar and the Clergy," by saying that "the pulpit, if die it must, will die hard." There is no occasion for the pulpit to die if it will reform, pay its taxes, keep its hands off other people's property and persons, teach sense, cease persecuting, and imagining that God has given the world to the saint and that the ministers are the saints.

SOME of the pious frauds in connection with the publication in "patent insides" of Talmage's thunderous platitudes are exposed in the Phelps county Herald, of Bertrand, Neb. It appears that a clergyman has discovered that some of the sermons ostensibly delivered by Talmage, who is now abroad, are reproductions of his old sermons printed in this country years ago. The Herald, which used to be a sufferer from such imposition, says the fraud is only a fair sample of that constantly practiced on the public by this "eminent swindle." "When we used to hav the sermons sent us in stereotype plates," it adds, "we frequently received them a week before the delivery of the discourse. One week the plates were dated 'Fort Scott, Kan.' Just from curiosity we investigated the matter and found that the noted doctor had not been at Fort Scott at all, and was not within a thousand miles of the state of Kansas on that date. Two years ago the Chautauqua management at Crete engaged the preacher to address their assembly on a certain day. The time arrived, but the doctor did not come. Finally, he was discovered on top of Mt. Washington, in New Hampshire. Notwithstanding this, all the Western papers a day or two later contained 'An Address Delivered by Dr. Talmage at the Crete, Chautauqua.' He did the same thing with a Minnesota Chautauqua and was sued for damages, yet his supposed address on that occasion was published everywhere. Some time ago the famous Tabernacle burnt down one Sunday morning, but the next day the regular 'Talmage sermon, delivered at the Brooklyn Tabernacle,' appeared in all the papers, side by side with an account of the fire. Thus it becomes apparent that the publication of Talmage's sermons is made a business, connived at and consented to by the reverend gentleman himself, he sharing the profits. It isn't done to save souls, but to make money. There is no doubt but Talmage makes a fortune out of it every year, although he repeats some sermons and others never delivers at all. But it's a pious fraud—and the public will tolerate a pious fraud year after year, and never know they are being imposed upon." Just so.

THE house of representativs of the state of Washington has succumbed to pious influences and elected a chaplain, who expects to be paid from the public funds in the face of this constitutional provision: "No public money or property shall be appropriated for or paid to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction." The expectation shows how little the Christians care for law or constitutions or human rights when their pet superstition can be advanced by ignoring them. The Snohomish Weekly Eye says that those who most strongly opposed the election of the chaplain "did not object so much to prayers as to the attempt to over-ride the constitution. They even offered to help pay his salary out of their own pockets; but this did not satisfy the hypocrits and demagogs, who wanted to show their contempt for the constitution." The "pious lobbyists," adds the Eye, are pursuing the same tactics in the senate, but that body will probably refuse to employ a chaplain, as a majority of the senators say they will not vote money in direct violation of the constitution to please either Jew or gentile, Christian or Atheist. They agree with Mr. Eddy, of the lower house, who said in the debate on the subject: "I object to the payment of a chaplain, it being in my opinion unconstitutional. I also claim the right, as a citizen of this state, to worship God according to the dictates of my own conscience. I claim that no religion or no church has any right to compel me to worship God according to their belief. I claim that as a member of this legislature and as a servant of this state, the churches hav no right to force ministers upon me; that I am sent here to serve this state and not to serve the churches. We are servants to the people, and not servants of God. Of course I will hav to listen to the prayers whether they suit me or not, unless I wish to be discourteous to the house and the chaplain." It is no triumph of the thirty-two who voted to elect a chaplain over the minority of twenty-five who voted against the proposition. The minority hav rights which all are bound to respect.

THE editor of Church Progress, a Roman Catholic journal published in St. Louis, replying to a question as to the career and fate of Giordano Bruno, exhibits this charitable spirit. "Giordano Bruno," he says, was a Dominican friar, a cynic, a philosopher, and a liar. After having left the convent, he strolled over the world. After two years' delay, and a trial by the Inquisition in Venice and Rome, he was finally degraded from the sacred ministry, and, as it was customary in the sixteenth century, handed over to the civil power and executed in Rome. The governor of Rome arrested Giordano Bruno, after his degradation from holy orders, and had him taken to Tordinona prisons, where he might, had he wished, show repentance and so avoid death. By a law of justice he was given eight days to do so. It was hoped that during that time he would hav repented; but no, he remained obstinate. On the seventh day the governor sent word to the confraternity of San Giovanni Decollato to be in readiness to lend the last consolation to Bruno, as on the following day he would be executed. He remained obstinate to the end; consequently he was taken to the Campo de Fiori and burnt alive. Two circumstances relating to Giordano Bruno's death are related. One is that one of the Confortatori on the pyre itself, a few minutes before it was set fire to, tried to reconcile the apostate with God, and held up to him the crucifix to kiss; but Bruno, with a disdainful look, turned his head away. The second is that while he was being taken on the cart from the prison to the place of execution, it was necessary to gag him, so as to stop the terrible oaths which he was uttering. The civil power and not the church executed the vile wretch. If it was ever right to kill a blasphemer, a disturber of society, a corrupter of public and private morals, it was right for the civil government to kill Bruno." Think of what a country would be were priests like this editor in power!

A WALLA WALLA, Washington, paper of a late date has this item: "Rev. E. M. Foster, of the Free Methodist church, was brought before the probate court for examination as to his sanity. The complaint was sworn out by E. D. Nicholson, who lived close to the Fosters. On examination by Drs. W. A. Egbert and Y. C. Blalock, Foster was adjudged of sound mind and turned loose, but was first admonished by the physicians that if he continued as fanatical on questions of religion there was little doubt but that he would be insane within a year. The arrest and examination of Foster grew out of his own actions. In November Mrs. Foster gave birth to a child. Foster had at the time an abiding faith in the Christian Science doctrin, and instead of calling in a regular physician, he called in a faith-cure midwife. As a consequence Mrs. Foster has never recovered from her confinement. Some time since she called in Dr. Cropp, who prescribed for her, but whose medicins her husband was unwilling should be used. As it was thought she might die from lack of proper attention, it was thought best to bring the matter to a focus. On examination Foster showed that while not insane he was nevertheless in a fair way to become so through religious fanaticism. He stated that the conversion of his wife to his own faith, Christian Science and all, would sometimes oppress him like a heavy weight. The man was evidently honest in his opinion, and felt that he was doing the best thing possible for his wife by not permitting the use of medicins. In this the probate judge and examining doctors disagreed with him, and he was informed that he must stop his system of forced conversion, or stand the chance of a much more serious charge being preferred." One of our subscribers, in forwarding the account, makes these observations: "I hav no objections to anybody believing in the faith cure, but they should not force it on others. I think when they are sick they should practice it on themselvs, and die if they want it." Our subscriber seems to be a sensible sort of man.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Jan. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: To a busy man who has not time to study the question, your pictures would in a moment of time convey an idea of the ridiculous nature of many preachers' pretensions. J. J. SNELL.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $29, for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to the following named nine new subscribers, and for books, and for six renewals. There are fourteen votes for the pictures. W. J. LOOKE.

DELPHOS, KAN., Jan. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3.25—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. I cannot get any more to subscribe, as the times are so hard. We hav lost four crops in this part of Kansas. I vote for the pictures.
DELBERT COOK.

SAN MARCIAL, N. M., Jan. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send you address of a new subscriber, who sends a "V" for two years' subscription. I hav secured the promis of five more names. This subscriber votes decidedly for the pictures. W. J. RIBLEY.

MILTON, PA., Jan. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. I absolutely object to the pictures. They do vastly more harm than good. The tendency is to lower the tone of the paper. ISAAC MARSH.

MANCOS, COL., Jan. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $12.90 for two renewals and books as written on the inclosed list. I would like you to continue the pictures, as they are a great help in showing up the Bible in the proper light. GEO. BAUER.

ELK RAPIDS, MICH., Jan. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find funds for a new six months' subscriber—another vote for the object-lessons. Long may they continue to adorn the covers of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. ALEX. CAMPBELL.

MOUNT UNION, Jan. 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 for two years more. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since the first issue in Paris, Ill. I am getting old, being seventy-eight years, and expect to take it the rest of my days, pictures and all.
Yours respectfully, WM. ANTRAM.

POSEN, MICH., Jan. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $2—$1.75 to help the pictures, and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1890. Discontinuing the illustrations in the famous TRUTH SEEKER would be lamentable retrogression.
VINCENT DRONSUTOWIOZ.

ARAPAHOE, NEB., Jan. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please to keep Heston at work. His cartoons are splendid. It was they that converted me to Freethought. Long may they liv. I will try and send you some new subscribers when I renew. Please send the ANNUAL.
WM. GATH.

BRUCE, S. D., Jan. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $7.25 to renew my subscription, and for your ANNUAL for 1890, also for two new subscribers. We all vote for the pictures. I send list of persons to whom samples may be sent, as you request.
Respectfully yours, T. J. CARPENTER.

HUDSON, WIS., Jan. 28, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for one new subscriber for two years. This is my promised mite toward the continuation of the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope to be able to send you another before long. The new subscriber votes for pictures. CHAS. HANSON.

BYRON, MINN., Jan. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I hand you twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. I would be very much disappointed to see Mr. Heston's cartoons discontinued, and shall do my best to send you my vote for their continuance, backed by some new subscribers, soon. WALTER A. JOHNSON.

TACOMA, WASH., Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: That one article from R. G. Ingersoll, "Why I Am an Agnostic," is worth the price of the paper. In regard to the cartoons, do as you think best; but for me, I would rather see a good portrait of some of our leading Liberals on the first page of every paper. M. B. CRANE.

BUSHNELL, ILL., Jan. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I want to add my feeble voice in support of the pictures. The time has passed for opposing the monstrous absurdities of religion with any other weapon than ridicule, it seems to me. S. L. BABBITT, M.D.

OLD RIPLEY, ILL., Jan. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In registered letter you will find money for renewal and new subscribers. I want to giv you my opinion of those pictures. I hav only taken your paper about two years, and hav got three subscribers, and I know it is by the aid of the pictures. Do not let Heston go out of our family.
Yours truly, PETER PLOG.

DES MOINES, IA., Jan. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find $5.30 for two copies, one copy to a new subscriber and one to me. I would hav written sooner, but hav had the grip and could not get the subscribers that I wanted to, but when I get out I will try it again. We send two votes for the pictures. M. P. STEEL.

THOMASTON, CONN., Jan. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I should hav sent before, but expected to hav more subscribers to send you. Do not forget the ANNUAL. Those cartoons are very instructiv. They speak more than words can express. I would rather pay more for the paper than hav the paper without them. M. SMEND.

EDWARDSBURG, MICH., Jan. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to the pictures, they are very good to those who can appreciate them. My family used to read some of the papers, but since the pictures they refuse to look at or read the paper. They are Christians. I shall take the paper with or without pictures. H. B. MEAD.

CATHLAMET, WASH., Jan. 13, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10 to be used for subscriptions new and old, the ANNUAL, and books as hereinafter stated. I vote for outside pictures, but do not care for inside ones. But that is your business. I hav the promis of two more new subscribers later. LIDA I. ALBERT.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 for picture continuation. I cannot procure you any subscribers, for various reasons. I am the only Freethinker the family has produced. However, I giv THE TRUTH SEEKER a circulation in that priest-ridden island, Ireland, it never attained before. WM. MATHEWS.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., Jan. 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5—$3 for the renewal of my subscription, $1.50 for the "Cosmian Hymn Book," twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, and the remainder for the pictures. I wish to see them continued. They show a great deal of superstition and ignorance in the so-called inspired word of God. Yours respectfully, C. M. WALDRON.

PRESCOTT, IA., Jan. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5 to renew my subscription and for a new subscriber. Continue the pictures, if possible, and I am sure they will hurt nobody's feelings unless they hav worn the collar too long, in which case their galls will get well if they continue to take your medicin.
Fraternally, E. CLARKE.

BAKER'S CORNER, IND., Jan. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $14 25 for paper, ANNUAL, and books. We like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much at our house. It is our best paper. We hav tried to get you some new subscribers, but hav failed thus far. We liv in an orthodox neighborhood, one of the "deepest dye." Continue the pictures. LIZZIE F. BAKER.

HOWARD, KAN., Jan. 13, 290 E.M.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find postal note for $1.70, for which please send me the ANNUAL and the books named. Also send me a catalog of your publications. I sincerely hope the pictures will remain. We are doing good missionary work here, and hav to hav literature, so, hoping to receive the books soon, I am, Yours, O. U. ROBERTS.

DEXTER, MO., Jan. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5—$3 to renew my subscription; $1 for a continuation of friend Heston's great work, which I thiuk is a great help to our cause. I am in favor of his putting it to them just as hard as the law will allow. The harder the fight, the sooner it will be over. The other dollar you can apply in any way you think best.
J. W. MCCOLLUM.

MERIDEN, CONN., Jan. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6 to renew my subscription, also for a new subscriber. Also one copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and books as below. What is left may go toward the pictures, and I hope to find some more subscribers for you. I am very much in favor of continuing the pictures. Wishing you a Happy New Year,
Yours fraternally, JOHN MORSE.

REDMON, ILL., Jan. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50—$1 to help continue Heston's pictures, and fifty cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS for 1889 and 1890. In my opinion, the objectors to Heston's work on THE TRUTH SEEKER will do us no good. When people get so nice that a lie suits them better than the truth, let them go to where they belong. Honi soit qui mal y pense. Hew to the line. MARK ROWE.

MAKANDA, ILL., Jan. 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the ANNUAL, and send two or three numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to each of the named persons. Both parties are right about the pictures. An ignorant or very bigoted Christian is repelled by them, but more, I think, are attracted. In my own experience their presence has done good. I hav seen their good influence among thinking church-members and others.
W. W. WALKER.

COALING, ALA., Jan. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find the following subscribers. If you will allow me, I want to say what cartoons hav done here. All that I hav sent, which must be some $30 in two years, hav been obtained by them, not by the reading. It is my experience that people will not read until their curiosity is excited. And the pictures do that. The Christian will not read the book in which he finds his eternal life, but lets the priest do it for him. Yours truly, H. J. WARD.

MARIPOSA, CAL., Jan. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I write to renew my right to read THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year more. I send post-office order for $3 75—$3 for the paper, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, and fifty cents for the continuation of the pictures. I say, by all means continue the pictures. I think I can get a new subscriber; at least, I am going to try.

I hope you may get not only five hundred new subscribers, but five hundred times that number. S. L. HOGAN.

ISHPEMING, MICH., Jan. 20, 1890

MR. EDITOR: Thinking that Mr. Parton might be wrong in his assertion that all that approved of the pictures ought to be members of some church, I inclose $3 for another year's subscription, for I approve of the pictures, and do no feel capable of becoming a church-member, as I hate hypocrisy. As to getting new subscribers, I think it a hopeless task in this place, as I can get scarcely anyone to read my paper. FRANK TREBILCOCK.

PRESCOTT, IA., Jan. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4.75—$3 for my subscription, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, twenty-five cents for "For Her Daily Bread," and $1.25 for a new subscriber. This is the best I could do here, but I will still continue to work the best I can for the overthrow of superstition, oppression, and priestcraft. Please record two votes more in favor of continuing the pictures. They are truly object-lessons to both Liberals and theologians. J. B. BLACKBURN.

SNOHOMISH CITY, WASH., Jan. 19, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.90, to be applied as per order. My attempt to get a new subscriber for your valuable paper has been unsuccessful so far. I hav several of my neighbors cornered up. They are sitting at present on the fence, so to speak. I should be able to persuade them to jump into the broad field of Liberalism. Hav the pictures continued if you possibly can manage it. They are doing good work in uprooting superstition, and are first-class object-lessons. RICHARD ROESIGER.

DAYTON, WASH., Jan. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, and enjoy the cartoons, though some of them are quite ridiculous. We show them to our friends, and that causes them to look up the passage of scripture, which is always found to read just as stated below the cartoon. I think they show up the ridiculous part of the Holy Queer better than a dozen lectures. Below I will giv the names and address of some of the Liberals. Yours for the truth, W. M. BOGGS.

TOPEKA, KAN., Jan. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.25 to pay for two subscriptions—one a new man, and myself—and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. I like the pictures; they are excellent, and I will send you something toward them after a little. I do hope we shall be able to get together here in Topeka. There are enough here to make a good branch if we could get together once. All my children are eager to see the pictures, and read a good deal in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

P. H. GILL.

MEROED, CAL., Jan. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say I am in favor of the continuance of the pictures, and should be very sorry to hav them discontinued. I am not ashamed to show them to any of my friends, and to my Christian friends I take special delight in showing them. They may call it an Infidel paper, and sneer at it, but they must not tell me it is obscene. THE TRUTH SEEKER is sacred to me, because it contains truths—in text, as well as in pictures. Please send the ANNUAL.

Respectfully, E. M. HANSSON.

BAY, ARK., Jan. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send money for renewal, books as listed, and ANNUAL. With much interest I watch the vote on the pictures. Do not stop them if possible to continue. No genuin Liberal can object to either the first or last page if he puts proper construction to them. Church people who are honest in their convictions do not realize the selfish greed and general littleness, narrowness, and conservatism of their faith, and nothing will teach them the true nature of the beast so quickly and pointedly as will Heston's first-page pictures. FRANK FRAZIER.

DETROIT, MICH., Jan. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you my check for $15 25, for which you will mail THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to five new subscribers, and myself the ANNUAL. And if possible, let the Heston cartoons appear regularly on the outside covers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. In my opinion, Heston's cartoons, especially those representing biblical characters, are doing more to advance the cause of Freethought and investigation among the more ignorant class of Christians than could be accomplished in any other way.

Respectfully yours, W. D. SMITH.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Jan. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find the money for five new subscribers, besides the renewal of my own subscription. I hav been trying to get some subscribers for you for a good while, and at last hav succeeded. All the new subscribers, as well as myself, want Heston's pictures continued. I think they should be continued on this account—they attract people's attention where, if they were omitted, the paper would not be noticed. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last three years, and it is the best paper that I hav ever seen. JOHN APSEY.

FORT FAIRFIELD, Jan. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $7 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and one ANNUAL. I want to see the pictures continued. Those weak-kneed Liberals that do not want to see the superstitious fraud called religion exposed, are a good deal like the man that prayed, "Good Lord and good devil." He did not know whose hands he was going to fall into. They are only partly converted. Any person that knows anything about the history of the church with its crimes of torturing, burning, imprisoning, must want to see sledge-hammer blows. Yours truly, JOSEPH A. CONANT.

DUBLIN, IND., Jan. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $4 for renewal, ANNUAL, and books named. The thirty-five cents balance you may add to your own account and apply it in any way you think best. As regards the pictures, I look upon them as being on extremes to the extent that they are repulsiv to the better feelings of the community. But since a majority of the patrons claim that the pictures are doing great good, I submit—not that I think that the majority is always right, but because I am going to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, pictures or no pictures, as long as it advocates free thought, free speech, and free press. MILTON THOMBURGH.

HUBBARD, O., Jan. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed twenty-five cents, for which send the ANNUAL for 1890. I see a good many of your readers are giving their opinion of the pictures. I will giv mine, too. I think that they are one of the best features of the paper, as they are the first thing my grandchildren examin, and you know it is a great thing to get the attention of the young. The church understands that. See what pictorial papers it has for the young—pictures of angels, and good little boys and girls giving their nickels to the missionary-box. I hav tried to get a new subscriber, but can not, so I do the next best thing, and lend it. If I was rich enough, I would pay Heston myself.

ADAM ARCHBOLD.

FORT LEWIS, COL., Jan. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find herein $1 to aid in continuing the illustrations, and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1890. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for fifteen years, and hav watched with pleasure and interest the steady advance the paper has made in that time, and to me, at least, the cartoons seem to be one of its best features. I hav a great deal of respect for Mr. Parton's opinion, and he must be right in supposing that the pictures repel some who see them, but that they repel more than attract I cannot believe. My own experience is that they attract the notice of and call forth remarks from almost everyone, and lead to a perusal of the columns of the paper that contains such unique illustrations. JAS. MCDONALD.

HANKINS, N. Y., Jan. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1890. As to the illustrations, I vote to continue them if possible. I thought at one time that the paper would do more good without them. I thought as some others of your readers, that I did not dare show them to my Christian friends. Now I hav found that it was only an imaginary fear. I show my paper and pictures every week to a Catholic lady friend of mine. All that she could say against them was, "What is the use of such silly things in the Bible?" and that she did not believe they were in their Catholic Bible; and as I hav no such Bible, I could not say that they were. Where could I get such a book, and what would be the cost? WM. S. GALLOWAY.

[The Truth Seeker Company will supply a Catholic Bible. As the Roman Catholic authorities are not desirous that the Bible be circulated among the laity, the price is rather high—about $2.—ED. T. S.]

ST. STEPHEN, N. B., Jan. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, and having the privilege of voting on the question "before the house," pictures or no pictures, you will please register me as in favor of keeping the illustrations where they are. A year ago I sent you the name of another subscriber. It is quite probable that he will renew again. I wish I could do a little more for the cause, but my business prevents me. I am aware that you cannot run a newspaper without proper support, and while I should regret the want of means as the cause of the discontinuance of the illustrations, yet I am prepared to accept the inevitable, and state only that I must hav THE TRUTH SEEKER anyway.

Yours fraternally, J. C. HENRY.

KINGSTON MINES, ILL., Jan. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: For inclosed $1 please send tracts suitable to circulate among our holy groaners here, as they are having a high old jamboree which will last for some time. I regret I cannot send you a new subscriber to aid in keeping the pictures going, but I hope to be able to do so soon. Regards to Brother Peck for his noble work. Go on. Desperate diseases require desperate remedies. They hav got it bad and we think blistering is what they need. Use the soothing syrup after if required. If not, blister again. And, if it is not too delicate a subject to treat, I hope Brother Heston will be able to giv our old patriarch David a twist. We think he would be a good subject. Or how would Solomon do with his three hundred wives and seven hundred concubines? T. W. BOTTS.

BRODHEAD, WIS., Jan. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose renewal and a new subscription. I hav been working for some time to get a few new subscribers for your paper, but it is uphill business with so many Liberals. They sit down and talk and make sport of old orthodox ideas, but fail to realize the necessity of giving substantial aid to the cause so that success may result. I may be able ere long to send in a few more dollars, if I can get to see the parties before they cool off too much. You can put me down as solid in favor of Heston's cartoons. I think they are worth as much as the inside reading of the paper. The impressions they make on the mind are far more lasting, especially with the young and tenderfooted, than anything you can print on the inside. By all means the Liberals must keep Heston at work. I inclose names of Liberals to whom you may send sample copies. E. P. HASSINGER.

NORSE, TEX., Jan. 10, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Although I regret to say that I hav not been successful in securing any new subscriptions lately, yet having recently sent you my own renewal of subscription for two years, with an order for books, I shall venture to giv expression to my views upon the subject of pictures or no pictures. I am opposed to continuing the pictures or cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER in their present position. I do not consider it good policy to hav such cartoons in such a conspicuous place as on the first page. In a humorous paper it would be appropriate; otherwise I do not think it is, especially not for them to appear thus, regularly every week. And it shocks the feelings of our Christian friends and neighbors who might otherwise be induced to read an occasional number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thus be led on to investigation. I hav even had Liberal friends tell me that they did not like such repulsiv pictures as were some of these cartoons to shock their sensitiv children's feelings. I know some of these cartoons are admirable object-lessons. And if you can print them on a supplement I am in favor of them, otherwise I am opposed to their continuance.

Fraternally, T. THEO. COLWICK.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Jan. 14, 290.

MR. EDITOR: We are in favor of the continuation of the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mrs. Abbott took down a gripsack of back numbers to the New Cambria Literary Society and distributed them among the boys. Some were so eager to get them they could not wait till she got around to them, but hollaed, "Save me one." The whole intermission was taken up in each one examining everyone else's paper, and it afforded a good deal of comment and amusement. I suggest that all Liberals that belong to lodges, labor unions, Alliances, etc., procure the names in their local organization, at least, and forward to the editor of the Liberal paper they are taking, that he or she may send them sample copies of the paper. This you can do by two of you having it understood that one of you is to take the first name and one the next, and so on, while the secretary is calling the roll; or you can request the secretary to giv you a list of the names of the members, or allow you to be permitted to draw them off. It is very important to reach the laboring class of the country, because they are not wrapped up in policy and hypocrisy, and so we hav nothing to do but convince their judgment. And if we can read the signs of the times, this will be a very important thing to do, because in a very few years they will shape the legislation of the country.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am endeavoring to get a new subscriber, and it will be strange if I do not succeed. My sentiments with regard to the pictures may be gathered from the following acrostic:

Who makes us smile, when we are sad,
At cartoons good—some say they're bad—
That make the preachers awful mad?
Why, Heston.

Say, who is it that grasps the thought,
Or pictures it just as he ought,
Nor fails to teach the lesson sought?
Why, Heston.

How comes it that some want them not?
"Engravings are a vulgar blot,"
Say these good men; that's all they've got
'Gainst Heston.

To tell the truth, I want them in,
O, Eugene, dear, they are no sin;
Now Liberals let us work and win,
For Heston.

Will some one arise and answer these questions? If "God is light and in him is no darkness" (1 John i, 5), and if God filled the whole before and after the creation, how could the "darkness [be] upon the face of the deep?" After God had created light by saying "Let there be light," what was the use of making a "sun to giv light?" And what became of the light which he had already made?

JOHN HUDSON.

MARSH, IDA., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As many are giving their ideas and votes in regard to the pictures, I will do the same. What causes the average man of intelligence to become an Infidel, not to believe a good God could "inspire" men to write such a book as the so-called holy Bible, if the reading of it has not done it? Therefore those pictures are not for the instruction of those who already know the filth and obscenity contained between its leaves. I always hav taken it for granted those pictures were not placed there by those who did it to offend their fellow-man, but for a far different purpose, viz., to draw the attention of many who depend wholly upon some "unproducing" shepherd to tell them about the holy book, instead of reading for themselvs and using their own reasoning powers. And if by pictures they could be led to read from Gen. xxx to Ezek. xxiii, thence to Cor. vii, they might possibly get their own brain to work a little and be better prepared to decide whether it is a fit book for the public schools of the nineteenth century. Why, when I was a school-boy and my feet scarcely touched the floor, while the teacher was mumbling his prayer, for the teachers all had to do it then, the boys were hunting foul stuff from that holy book to pass over to the opposit sex. It was there, while I was a child, my reasoning powers revolted at such a God-book. I would ask, is it reasonable to suppose children who attend school nowadays are very much different from what they were a half century ago? I hav often thought could there be over each holy Bible picture some words similar to the following: "These pictures are not for the purpose of wounding the feelings of any class, but meant to call the attention of non-readers of the holy scripture to what is really there and prompt them to please read the whole chapter of each illustration." Of course the wolves in sheep's clothing who prey upon the lambs may take offense. It is to be expected, for from the flock comes the meat. But I really cannot see why the lambs should take offense, if they will just take a gentle hint from the pictures and read their book.

It takes different methods to reach different intellects and brains. Some would be reached by history written by Mr. Parton, some by R. G. Ingersoll, some by reading Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," if we could get them to read these books, but many cannot be reached. But I think there is a large class who can be reached by those pictures in the following manner. First, that the unposted as to the contents of the Bible be let to know that they are not for offense but meant for prompting them to examin for themselvs. Then every subscriber would feel more like handing his paper to his Christian friend (if he is lucky enough to hav such), feeling by so doing he will not lose his friendship by his taking it as an insult instead of an act of friendship. Why, a Christian friend told me a short time since there was not a passage in the holy Bible but that was fit to read in a public school, and he is an intelligent man who has sat in our halls of legislation. Can it be possible for others to get offended at those who would see them inform themselvs about the Bible, if it be done in a proper and friendly manner? I think God himself—if there be one—would vote for the continuance of those pictures. For he must see they tend to vindicate his character, for I do believe every Infidel believes God is not so low in the scale of manhood as to inspire ignorant men to pen such thoughts as are to be found in the Bible. Inclosed is my vote ($1) for the pictures. A. G. CHURCH.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

M. Louise Baker.

"BEING DEAD, SHE YET SPEAKETH."

Last summer's flowers in beauty stood
Types of all things fair and good,
But one amidst the blossoms seen
Of all things fair and pure was queen;
And as she passed each flow'ret fair
Shed sweeter fragrance on the air.
Like an industrious bee she drew
Sweet nectar from each flower that grew;
And in requital thus she sung
A song of Love when Love was young,
And Love was Hope and Hope was strong—
This, as I deem it, was her song:
"O faithful flowers! I love ye well,
Far more than I hav power to tell;
For, three-and-twenty years ago,
Ye crowned me May queen here below.
In Iowa, my natal day
(Though not the first but tenth of May),
Full many an early flower I ween
Came forth to crown me as your queen.
Where'er I go, south, east, north, west,
My lieges fair, I love ye best.
Even now September's storms draw nigh
When your unsheltered tribes must die,
For in Nebraska's northern clime
Too soon must come that fatal time;
And even 'neath Ponca's friendly hills
Soon comes the frost that chills and kills.
But, dearest flowers, ye need not fear,
For from your roots another year
Again in fragrant beauty's power
Your presence shall reclaim this hour;
On prairie and in grove and dell
Again your beauteous tribes shall dwell.
But when ye all are sleeping low
Beneath a winding-sheet of snow,
Some dear remembrances shall last
To bid defiance to the blast;
For then as teacher I shall lead
My pupils all to love your breed;
And when your faces reappear
A score of friends shall greet ye here;
And one, far more than friend is he,
Will come to greet both ye and me.
Now hide my royal secret deep,
Remember well and truly keep,
So, when arrives my bridal hour,
My chaplet shall not lack one flower."
Each petaled head in homage bent
Its silent token of assent.
Not yet September's race half run
From three o'clock till set of sun.
Unloose the lightning's flashing fire
To bear death's message o'er the wire.
Father, mother, sisters, brothers,
Yet the message is another's.
Speed the message far and wide,
"Sunday three o'clock she died."
Crushed between two awful sorrows,
One to-day's and one to-morrow's;
Her sire, beside her grandsire's bed,
Left the dying for the dead.
Onward, onward, car and steam—
Does he wake or does he dream?
Oh, if he might only wake
From this horrible mistake!
"Ponca!" carriage, strangers kind,
Finds Louise embalmed, enshrined,
In a casket richly lined;
Floral tributes well designed,
A star-crowned lyre, an anchor too,
And other pieces rare to view.
Conspicuous from its absence quite,
No Christian cross arrests the sight;
For here Death set his awful seal
To curb the ardent Christian's zeal,
And even the priest forebore his creed
In this sad hour of human need.
Ye faithful flowers, if human mind
Survive the form it leaves behind,
We well may say your fragrant breath,
With hers, defies the power of Death,
And still in fair elysian bowers
The queen survives amid her flowers,
And, with her floral train complete,
Welcomed her grandsire to her seat.
Not so, thought she, nor so do I,
Yet this I know—Love cannot die;
The singer dies, the song survives,
And stirs a thousand other lives.
We plant a tree upon her grave
Above her dust its leaves to wave.
A bed of flowers above her tomb,
Wet by our tears next year shall bloom.

J. K. P. BAKER.

[We giv in this issue a generous space to the memory of one of our number who has said good-bye, and gone to join the "silent majority." Louise was a young lady of unusual genius and fair promis. Her poetic gems hav sometimes graced the columns of the Children's Corner, and they always breathed a spirit of purity and peace. We sincerely sympathize with the bereaved parents, relativs, and friends. In the memory of those who knew and loved her, Louise will liv forever. The fragrance of her sweet, brief life can never be forgotten. In the words of our beloved Ingersoll:

The record of a generous life, vinelike,
Runs round the memory of our dead,
And every sweet, unselfish act,
Is now a perfumed flower.
Upon the peaceful shore of death,
The sea of trouble casts no wave.
Eyes curtained by the everlasting dark,
Will never know again the burning touch of tears.

Lips touched by eternal silence
Will never speak again the broken words of grief.
Within the tomb no veiled and weeping sorrow sits,
And in its gloom is crouched no shuddering fear.

And so
We leave our dead where nature leaves them;
We love, we wait, we hope.

Above, the father of Louise tells the story of her last hours on earth.—ED. C. C.]

A Hint to Young Folks.

Young people, who are consciously or unconsciously acquiring manners and habits that will cling to them and fix upon them for a lifetime a distinctiv mark of good or bad breeding, should, among other things, carefully shun the parrot-like utterance of any certain phrase or exclamation. The uncouthness of this habit has been very nicely illustrated by a writer for boys and girls, who says:

I sat by Mrs. Blank (her husband is a clergyman) in the street-car a few days ago, and after we had exchanged greetings, I said: "My cousin Angeline sails from Liverpool to-day." "Is that so!" said Mrs. Blank. "Yes," I said, rallying as well as I could, for this reply takes all the spirit from me, "and she is always very ill on the ocean." "Is that so!" said Mrs. Blank again. A pause followed. How can one continue to pay out the coin of conversation if not even the interest comes back?

I was glad to get out of the car and meet pretty Amy Dexter. I had a bit of news for her. Amy is in the high school, and I told her at once that Mrs. Cummins, who taught her botany last year, is to be married.

"Is that so!" returned Amy. I love Amy, but I do not like "Is that so!" and I hastened to get out of its way; but as I went along Frank Sullivan overtook me, and will you believe that when I asked Frank if Mr. Stockton had really promised to answer the question, "The Lady or the Tiger?" he exclaimed, "Is that so!" Later in the day I told Mr. Emory that his playing of the organ last Sunday had been much complimented, and he smiled and murmured, "Is that so!"

Her Theory.

The poet says that "a little learning is a dangerous thing," but that was not the idea of a certain colored woman who wanted her boy taught just enough, and not too much. She appeared one day at the door of a country school-house, leading by the hand a black and big-eyed boy of about ten years. His old clothes showed a mother's watchful care in their patches and cleanliness.

"I want ter start him into yo' school, sah," she said to the teacher. "He ain't nebbah went to school none, sah. Hit ain't been so's we could send him, en we didn't car' much if he didn't go none ontel he was ten yeahs ole, sah."

"Does he know his letters?" the teacher asked.

"He don't know nuffin', sah," his mother replied, with cheerful frankness, "en I'd ruther he wa'n't pushed for'd too fast, sah. His pa en me we's made up our minds we'd sooner hab him good dan too sma't."

"Don't you think that he can be both good and smart?" asked the amused teacher.

"I dunno 'bout dat," she replied, shaking her head doubtfully. "Me en his pa we's watched dese sma't men a good deal, en we's made up our minds dat hit's de sma't folks what does mos' ob de mischief in de worl'. Dat's so, sah. Dar sma'tness jes' makes dem tricky, en puts dem up ter meanness dey'd nebbah know how to do if dey'd been a little mo'ign'rant. So we jes' want our boy learned to read en write, so's he won't be quite a fool, en den we want 'im learned ter be good. Dat's ob mo' consekence den too much sma'tness."—Youth's Companion.

A Bully Old King.

Two American boys made the acquaintance of the king of Denmark under very peculiar circumstances. They were skylarking in the streets of Copenhagen, and one boy tossed the other's hat into a tree. While the victim was trying to dislodge it there came along an old gentleman with an umbrella under his arm and his head buried in his book. "Please, sir," said the hatless boy, "will you get my hat?" The old gentleman fished around with his umbrella for about five minutes, and failing to dislodge the hat, allowed the boy to mount his shoulders, and, with the umbrella, finally captured the hat. As the boy dismounted and thanked the old gentleman, another gentleman came along, who saluted and called the one with the umbrella, "Your majesty." Being an American, our boy was not paralyzed, but he thinks the king deserves his kingdom. In fact, the king of Denmark is a capital fellow. He loves to mingle with the people in their amusements, and there is no fol-de-rol of royalty about him.

Not So Easy.

A young poet, not averse to letting strangers know that he was a poet, was one day in the country with a party of friends. Stopping for some milk at an humble farmhouse, they saw an old lady weaving a rag carpet on an old-fashioned loom in a small outbuilding.

Several of the party had never before seen a rag carpet woven, among the number the young poet.

After watching the process for several minutes, he said, in a patronizing tone:

"That looks simple, but I dare say, grandmother, I could write a poem easier than I could weave a yard of that carpet."

"Like enough," replied the aged weaver, simply, with no intention of placing the young man in an embarrassing position before his friends, "like enough, sir; for, after all, it takes some brains to do this."—Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

EAGLE HARBOR, WASH., Jan. 14, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Children's Corner. I hav been reading the letters. It has been snowing here very hard for this winter. And we hav a baby and he is very cunning, too, and that is all I can think of this time.

Yours truly, CLATIE JAMES WILLIAMS.

SAN JACINTO, CAL., Dec. 30, 1889.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter to print in the Children's Corner. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to look at the pictures and read the Corner. I go to school and study reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic, spelling, and singing. We hav a good teacher; her name is Miss Clara Long. I am eleven years old. My birthday is the 17th of July. Well, I guess I will close for this time. I wish you all a Happy New Year. LUCINDA C. CLARK.

CORINTH, ILL., Jan. 18, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to you and the Children's Corner again. I am going to school. I study reading, spelling, and arithmetic. I go to church sometimes. I do not like to very much. They had a show at our school-house last week. I like to go to the show better than to go to church. We liv in the country and father is a farmer. It has been very warm here this winter. The wheat looks as green as in May.

I will close for this time, hoping to see this in print. ROSA MARGET WILLIAMS.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., Jan. 20, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see so many boys and girls writing for the Corner, I thought I would try and write. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER; we all like it very much. I take great pleasure in reading the Children's Corner. I am thirteen years old. I go to the village high school, which is six miles from my home. I hav a room in the village, and room with a friend of mine. I go to meeting once in a while; my friend goes quite often. I tell her I can see no sense in listening two or three hours to such nonsense. There is one old lady that speaks in meeting; she says one thing every night, and that is, "I love Christ, and I giv my heart to Jesus." They all laugh at her, but I think it is wrong, for they make as simple remarks themselvs. I hav a little sister seven years old, and a little brother two months old; we all think a great deal of him. Hoping to see this in the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, for it is my first attempt, and wishing you success in your noble work, I remain,

Your Freethinker friend,
LIZZIE WALDRON.

[We welcome Lizzie to our Corner, and hope she will write often.—ED. C. C.]

THINK all you speak, but speak not all you think;
Thoughts are your own, your words are so no more;
Where wisdom steers wind cannot make you sink,
Lips never err when she does keep the door.

LITTLE WILLIE has been summarily corrected by his mother for repeated acts of naughtiness. The punishment being over, "Papa," he sobs, in tones of anguish, "how could you marry such an ill-tempered woman as mamma?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Irreverent Remarks.

Noah and the Wine.

I.

When Noah bade the ark farewell
And pensiv sat to think a spell,
An unknown figure met his eyes,
Perchance a herald from the skies,
Who said: "Since you hav done your best
The gods will grant you one request."

II.

"My dearest sir," good Noah said,
"The water here affects my head,
Because the sinners great or small
Were in it drowned, both one and all,
And so my wish will be, I think,
To hav some other, better drink."

III.

His wish was granted in a trice,
The wine was sent from paradise,
With lessons how to make it grow,
And counsel good for him to know.
And Noah, filled with grateful mirth,
Bowed down delighted to the earth.

IV.

Then calling to his wife and child,
He told them both, in accents mild,
What all the confab was about,
And quickly laid a vineyard out.
When five or six short years were o'er
The bottles reached his second floor.

V.

Against this you can nothing say.
He took his wine in pious way.
Like upright Dutchmen later born,
To the honor of heaven he drained his horn,
And after the deluge it appears
He lived three hundred and fifty years.

VI.

So each of you can plainly see
That wine is good for you and me,
And also that a righteous man
Ne'er mixes water in his can.
Because the sinners, great and small,
Therein were drowned, both one and all.

—From the Dutch.

Peter's Present.

'Twas the night before Christmas in Kingdom Come,
The saints were in bed and their harps were all dumb,
Their halos turned out (to economize gas)
And their stockings hung up on the gate way of brass.

Said Peter: "I'll just run around for a minute
To look at my stocking and see what is in it;
The good little angels are all fast asleep,
And no one will know I hav taken a peep."

And, lo and behold! In the dawning light dim,
His stocking—apparently full to the brim!
He took it down quickly, and there, if you please,
Was a little toy rooster that crows when you squeeze.

. . . . .

As the saint hurried off in undignified haste,
He was overheard muttering, "Confounded bad taste!"
And somehow the story got round the next day,
And now he don't hang up his stocking, they say.

—Oliver Herford in Life.

If the trustees of the Metropolitan Museum had more sympathy with working people and less respect for their own cast-iron opinions the doors of that institution would be open on Sundays. Paintings and statuary are not going to debase the poor, even on the Sabbath. Make an effort, gentlemen, and try to realize it! But if, as appearances indicate, you hav made up your minds that you will not realize it, put up a sign over the principal entrance every Sunday morning, and let it bear these words:

THE POOR BE DAMNED.

This will show that you hav the courage of your convictions, and as the laborer, with his overworked wife and sad-eyed children, trudges back to his sunless home you will hav taught him, once again, that he must look to alcohol for relaxation on the Sabbath, and not to art.—Life.

First burglar (in dining-room): "Faith, Dinnis, here's some foine cold mate. Oime hungry, too, after goin' t'rough de house." Second burglar (catching sight of the clock): "Sure and we can't ate it, Bill. It's Friday mornin', begobs!" First burglar: "Well, that's too bloimed bad! Whoi didn't we hurry up a bit?'—Life.

Caller: "Why don't you try Christian Science for Fido? You know how much it did for our baby." Hostess: "Yes, but I can't afford to fool with the life of that dog. Why, he cost $45."—Boston Gazette.

Little brother (thoughtfully): "I don't believe there is any fairies." Little sister (shocked): "Oh, you bad, wicked Agnostic! You'll be losing faith in Santa Claus next!"—Life.

Faust: "I say, Mephistopheles, do you belong to the Four Hundred?" Mephisto: "No, Fausty. The Four Hundred belong to me."—Life.

It seems hardly worth while to call attention of old-time radical thinkers to "Plain Home Talk," since probably most of them are familiar with it. Yet there may be some such who hav lost or loaned their copies of the work and who would be glad to get a new copy of the latest revised edition. To the younger generations of Liberals and to recent converts to Freethought literature "Plain Home Talk" is a book that offers much of interest in the line of radical thought on marriage and social relations, besides much very valuable instruction concerning physiology, hygiene, and what it is well for everyone to know concerning disease, its causes, prevention, and treatment.—Truth Seeker.

Gems of Thought.

EVERY day quacks gravely condemn each other, and fools are compelled to pay fines to others equally ignorant. This world has long resembled that madhouse in which he who believed himself to be the holy father anathematized him who believed himself to be the Holy Ghost.—Voltaire.

MEN and women hav been burnt for thinking there is but one God; that there was none; that the Holy Ghost is younger than God; that God was somewhat older than his son; for insisting that good works will save a man without faith; that faith will do without good works; for declaring that a sweet babe will not be burnt eternally, because its parents failed to hav its head wet by a priest; for speaking of God as though he had a nose; for denying that Christ was his own father; for contending that three persons, rightly added together, make more than one; for believing in purgatory; for denying the reality of hell; for pretending that priests can forgiv sins; for preaching that God is an essence; for denying that witches rode through the air on sticks; for doubting the total depravity of the human heart; for laughing at irresistible grace, predestination, and particular redemption; for denying that good bread could be made of the body of a dead man; for pretending that the pope was not managing this world for God and in the place of God; for disputing the efficacy of a vicarious atonement; for thinking the Virgin Mary was born like other people; for thinking that a man's rib was hardly sufficient to make a good-sized woman; for denying that God used his finger for a pen; for asserting that prayers are not answered, that diseases are not sent to punish unbelief; for denying the authority of the Bible; for having a Bible in their possession; for attending mass and for refusing to attend; for wearing a surplice; for carrying a cross and for refusing; for being a Catholic and for being a Protestant; for being an Episcopalian, a Presbyterian, a Baptist, and for being a Quaker.—Ingersoll.

I MAKE ye an offer,
Ye gods, hear the scoffer,
The scheme will not hurt you,
If ye will find goodness I will find virtue.
Though I am your creature,
And child of your nature,
I hav pride still unbended,
And blood undescended,
Some free independence
And my own descendants.
I cannot toil blindly,
Though ye behave kindly,
And I swear by the rood,
I will be slave to no God.—Thoreau.

THE great ghost will surely share the fate of the little ones. They fled at the first appearance of the dawn, and the other will vanish with the perfect day. Until then the independence of man is little more than a dream. Overshadowed by an immense personality, in the presence of the irresponsible and the infinit, the individuality of man is lost, and he falls prostrate in the very dust of fear. Beneath the frown of the absolute, man stands a wretched, trembling slave; beneath his smile he is at best only a fortunate serf. Governed by a being whose arbitrary will is law, chained to the chariot of power, his destiny rests in the pleasure of the unknown, . . . Is it possible that an infinit God created this world simply to be the dwelling-place of slaves and serfs? . . . I want no happiness in exchange for my liberty, and no immortality that demands the surrender of my individuality.—Ingersoll.

ONE of the accessory causes of the continuation of religious sentiment, is the natural cowardice of man; he dislikes to cut himself loose from any powerful organization, to stand alone, only supported by his own will, with no invisible helper or protector to come to his assistance. The average individual prefers to enter upon the struggle for existence supported by hundreds of others, and turn a close, serried front to the enemy. They want to feel an armed comrade behind and at each elbow, and in front too, if possible. They like to listen to the words of command and hav their movements determined by a higher authority.—Nordau.

IT is a responsibility to think and act for yourself. Most people hate responsibility. —Ingersoll.

Notes and Clippings.

THE bi-centenary of the Hamburg, Germany, Mathematical Society, of which Newton, Herschel, and Leibnitz were members, was celebrated on the 15th.

THE Freethinkers of England and America will be interested—but there is no need to be offended—by these remarks of Jo. Cook. They are from a recent interview in the Mail and Express: "There is no school of Infidelity that is intellectual and respectable in our time. The mythical theory put forward about the opening of the century in explanation of the origin of the New Testament, has been thoroughly overthrown, and no longer needs an answer in educated circles. As to the vulgar Infidelity of the time, represented by Ingersoll and Bradlaugh, it is by no means abreast of Infidel scholarship. It is half chaff and half chaffing, and has less and less influence on the men who love clear thought and who read all sides on every subject. My impression is that the school of Agnosticism is the most dangerous form of modern Infidelity, but that its chief support is a clique of writers whose homes are in London and who get a wide hearing because of the peculiar facilities they hav for reaching the public ear. Professor Huxley leads this clique, and the little band of London Agnostics is driven round and round the hill of London journalism, and seems to be an endless army because some portion of it is always in sight and on the march. But the company is really not a large one."

THE pope holds in his encyclical that it is a sin to disobey God for the sake of pleasing men; that it is wrong to break the law of Jesus Christ in order to obey the magistrate. He goes on to urge that if there is a conflict between the laws of the state and the law of God; if the law of the state inflicts injury upon the church or sets at naught "the authority of Jesus Christ which is vested in the supreme pontiff, then it becomes a duty to resist those laws and a sin to render obedience to them." As to the law of God, he asserts that God has intrusted the interpretation and guardianship of that law to the church; that the highest teacher in the church is the Roman pontiff, and that therefore it follows that all should be "perfectly submissiv to the church and the Roman pontiff as to God." The pontiff has power authoritativly to judge of the meaning of scripture, what doctrins are in harmony with it, what at variance, to declare what is virtuous and what is sinful; what is to be done and what not done in the work of salvation. As the church is the mistress of nations, and the pope is supreme teacher of the church, it is the duty of all races to submit both to full and ecclesiastical power. The state must not interfere with the church. The church, however, must concern herself about the laws formulated by states, and cannot giv either patronage or favor to those in the state who refuse to accept her rights.

THE Standard (Baptist), of Chicago, says: "It is very doubtful if, even yet, the Protestant people of America are fully alive to the nature of the issue made by the Roman Catholic priesthood in the matter of the Indian schools. The Catholic World, of New York, and it is to be presumed quite inadvertently, indicates it in the following editorial utterance: 'Every effort possible should be made by Catholics to prevent the confirmation of Morgan to the post of Indian commissioner. . . . Morgan's plan is specious and insidious. He proposes to place the Indian schools upon the same basis as the public schools. Is he for an instant to be tolerated?' Putting the two sentences together one has the whole case at the Catholic point of view. The hostility of Catholics to the public schools is no secret. They hav now an opportunity to make the issue a square one, and to test their strength in the war they are making upon this peculiarly American institution."

ANXIOUS FOR A SITUATION.

THE political sensation in Europe is the publication by Colonel Stoppel of the French army of a pamphlet advocating a union of France and Germany against Russia.

GOVERNOR FORAKER revealed in a speech on the 15th that in 1887 when our relations with Canada were strained over the fisheries, he and other governors were asked by the war department how many men each could hurry to Canada in case of an emergency.

THE following is the decree for the toleration of religion in Brazil: "Federal and state authorities are prohibited from making laws or regulations, or performing administrativ acts for the establishment or prohibition of any religion, and from making distinctions on account of religious and philosophical beliefs and opinions between inhabitants of this country, or in the services whose cost is defrayed by the public treasury. All religious denominations hav equally the right to liberty of worship and that of governing themselvs in accordance with their respectiv creeds without being disturbed in the private acts pertaining to the exercise of this right. The liberty hereby instituted embraces not only individuals in their individual acts, but also churches, associations, and institutes in which they are united, to all of which belongs the right to organize and maintain their corporate existence, without interference of the government, in conformity with the respectiv creeds and disciplin. Patronage, with all of its institutions and prerogativs, is hereby abolished. The legal capacity of churches and religious denominations to acquire and hold property is hereby recognized within the limits of the laws relating to mortmain, and they shall be maintained in the possession of their present property, including their places of worship. The federal government will maintain the salaries now paid to the priests and other functionaries of the Catholic church, and for one year will continue to giv state aid to the religious seminaries, and every state is at liberty to maintain clergymen of this and other churches in any manner not conflicting with the provisions of the preceding articles."

A NEW feature to be introduced in the census of 1890 is the collection of Sunday-school statistics.

ITALIAN Catholics, in their opposition to the new law by which the state will administer charities formerly handled by the church, are making capital out of the discovery that the secretary of one of the government bureaus of charity has embezzled 130,000 francs.

A Symposium.

How the New World Replaces the Old by Constructive Liberalism.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

The result proves that one of the happiest events in the history of American Liberalism is this symposium of THE TRUTH SEEKER. By it Freethinkers of every phase of talent and character are introduced to each other, and are found, probably to their own, and certainly to the surprise of everybody else, to be in substantial agreement. There is by their common vote and consent an affirmative, positive, and constructive side to Liberalism. Nay, that seems to be its chief if not only side; all negations and denials are claimed to be simply the out or obverse side of its affirmations, which, unfortunately, is all the side its opponents care to see. Hence, strangely, those who are really enthused by the great modern affirmations of the world are represented as its destroyers. While the higher integration is taking form, it is hidden from the common sight by the dust and rubbish of the falling ruins it is gloriously replacing.

It is extremely pleasing to observe not only this general affirmative drift of thought and purpose, but also the great ability and variety of illustration by which it is expressed. Each writer gives an honest, individual expression of inmost belief about the great issues of our age and time, but in the end these expressions seem to make a common effect, like the composite photograph of members of the same family. There is no need to mention anyone where each has contributed effectively to the common expression. It is to be regretted, of course, that the broad pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER could not take in all who should have been heard, but may they not appear as critics and continue the feast as their own?

It has been settled, then, that Liberals—that is, freed persons, those who are emancipated from theology, churches, and creeds, have at bottom a constructive purpose and intent. "Know the true in order to do the good," the motto and creed of Diderot, seems to be one in which they all concur. And also, like that great encyclopedist, they hope to aid, at least, in replacing the old world of superstition and dreams by one of science and progress.

But what does this undertaking involve? Have we ever duly reflected upon the extent, meaning, and consequences of this problem? When we come to look at it historically, as statesmen and social scientists should, we may well be appalled at the task which the present generation are called upon to perform. To put it in a sentence: The civilization, morality, liberty, culture, and preserving aspiration of the human race, have to be sustained and continued, while the old foundation upon which they rest and by which they were built up is removed and replaced by a new, solid foundation, laid in science and cemented by love. This is the greatest difficulty mankind have ever had to meet and it is a proper time to begin to appreciate it. The centuries have been occupied from fetichism to astrology, then to polytheism, then to monotheism, and now to simple theism, in building up a civilization with religions, politics, hopes, motives, and creative aspirations which are now seen to have no sounder basis than the illusions of the African rainmaker. The Hebrew, Christian, and Mohammedan peoples have until recently (when the Freethinkers began to come to the front) led and dominated the world. Their creed, their heaven, hell, life, motive, and immortality, was the result of their geocentric cosmogony and their tribal polity. Their cosmogony was the little three-story tenement house, as a world often described, but never too often, as "the city of God," with a living earth surface of human life-probation to end in a heaven above a firmament, or in a hell, below the earth's surface, as a basement and foundation of the whole structure. The fundamental beliefs of the Hebrew, Christian, and Mohammedan peoples have been their adjustment to and explanation of this tenement house. Their hopes and life motives have been such as it naturally excited.

Copernicus, Bruno, and Galileo with his telescope exploded this three-story tenement into infinity, and its creator out of personality. For nearly three hundred years people have been persistently denying the facts or consequences of this explosion, and have tried to keep on as though nothing much had happened. Such ostrich tactics will not longer avail. There must be a readjustment to the new environment—to a new world as different from the old as it is possible to conceive. The chief beliefs, motives, and life under the old solar system have no relation to the new. The old God, Christ, heaven, hell, devil, angels, soul, and immortality are hopelessly gone. There is no place or time for them, and with them go the old motives for living. Whether the loss is irreparable is the question. The hopeful Liberal says, No, and bravely faces the issue. But where in history has a civilization ever survived its religion? What is the lesson of Volney's "Ruins?" The life of a people is its faith which binds them together in one organic, inspired whole, living and working for some ideal bliss, infinite, incalculable. When that faith goes, no burning prophet, no St. Paul, no Mohammed, is possible; nor long can continue the polity and life which they have inspired. But say some Liberals: we have inherited nothing from these fanatics or impostors but falsehoods and hallucinations. True, but they have been powerful motives and creators, and we are children of the past. When the masses of the people see plainly that the old world is gone—no God, no hell, no heaven, no immortality, will they not say with Paul, under the same supposition: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die?" This are they not saying by what is called "the moral interregnum," in which the good falls with the bad? Is it true that we have inherited nothing of value from the old faiths? Moral sense, idealization, aspiration, brotherhood, humanity, and finally democracy have been worked out by their discipline under the belief of equality before a common creator, and a final equal, just, omniscient, and omnipotent judge. When that belief vanishes what will protect the people from the ravages of Herbert Spencer's brutal phase of Darwinism, in which the swift, the strong, and the cunning shall inherit the earth? What is to sustain the moral, the family, the fireside virtues, when individual greed and hedonism is all there is of a life snatching a few glimpses of the moon and ending in death? All thinking people are asking such questions. Therefore the priests of the old faiths from Cardinal Gibbons down cry out lustily: "Deeper with your heads in the sand—refuse to listen—crush your doubts—not to believe the old is to be damned. Our Christian heritage is the only hope and safety of the world!" Childish people are these, repeating the illusions of the childhood of the race after the sun has risen as the center of a new world. Let them restore the Ptolemaic astronomy, and all it implies, or be silent about its religion!

In this emergency the true hope and safety of the world is the affirmative, positive, and constructive side of Liberalism. Its advocates, leaders, and teachers are the real saviors. They insist that the adjustment of mankind to the infinite environment of the new astronomy of Copernicus and Bruno will lift the whole race as far above their old ideals and motives as the new world is larger than the old.

The difficulty is to sustain and preserve the good we have in our moral, emotional, intellectual, spiritual, and motive-life, until the new foundation can replace the old. Society and national life is organic and constant. To say that you will destroy and then rebuild is impossible. The problem is to rebuild the home of the individual and national life while the tenant must be in constant occupation and use. To compare very great things to little: The owners of Cooper Institute a few years ago found that its foundations were giving away and could not long sustain the superstructure. Instead of tearing it down the building was sustained by scientific appliances, given a new foundation, and practically renovated from top to bottom, and is now better than ever. The New York Times building has just gone through a similar process without even removing its occupants.

But the true simile for social and religious changes should be drawn from biology rather than from mechanics. Our old life-tree, Igdrasil, the race-tree of our northern forefathers, will do: It is fed by the generations of men. Each life is one of its leaves which, falling, even in its decay adds to its food and growth. Formerly its roots were stopped by the mountains and seas of a little world and a firmament above. Thus inclosed it seemed as though it had reached its full growth and must die. But now it has burst its barriers below and above—its roots promise to encircle the earth, and its branches to reach toward the stars in boundless growth and aspiration.

The transition from the old to the new environment must be gradual to be safe and healthy. No sudden demolition or transplanting is natural or evolutional. The life is always present in the organism, and cannot be stopped without danger. Slowly the roots must be drawn onward by a new and richer soil, and to it each individual leaf must add its share of growth in life, and of sustenance when it falls, and so right bravely and usefully do its share in the growing world.

In this wise the old will be replaced by the new, or will be effectively outgrown and overgrown by it, but never without effort. Like the process of growth, it must be ceaseless, tireless. Many are the ways this transition can be made or aided, and many have been so well indicated in this symposium that it is only necessary to ask the eye to look over its pages again to see how rich and fruitful in suggestions of new education and culture they are. Everywhere some part of the new and true world is proposed in place of the old. Everywhere a new ideal challenges a new effort or a new aspiration. Let each use the talent with which he is gifted, the tool which best fits his hand! All are needed:

The negative and critical Liberals to find and lay hold of the falsehoods and evils which must go with the old.

The Scientists which discover and publish the truth as such, without immediate regard to its practical utility.

The Philosophers who, out of science discovered build and generalize an explanation of the known world like Comte and Spencer.

The Social Scientists and Reformers, of which the Anarchists, Socialists, and Nationalists are our present representatives.

The New Religionists who, like the Positivists, Ethicals, and Monists, combine the Science of the New World and its ideals into a moving and consoling moral and "religious" culture and influence.

In this way we may often use a transitional symbolism. For instance, if the terms are truthfully explained the religious names and symbols of the old faith may be used to express the nearest corresponding conceptions of the New World, thus: The personal or anthropomorphic God becomes the impersonal, infinite All, the world, universe, or nature. For example, the last issue of the Open Court of Chicago, the advocate of Monism, says: "We welcome the idea that God is no person, but a law; not a being adaptable to circumstances, but an irrefragable authority; no deified egotism, but the omnipotent power of all-existence! This idea is the republican conception of theology which can conceive of order and of law without a Prince, and of religion without the fetich of anthropomorphism."

In a similar way the Christ is no longer a God or a little Hebrew reformer, whose historical existence is more than doubtful to say the least, but becomes the symbol and name of Man, humanity, the race in solidarity and continuity.

The Holy Ghost is no longer a spook, but the altruistic love and activity of the human heart individually and collectively.

Heaven is no imaginary place or state, but the future of emancipated and reformed mankind on earth; the Ideal toward which it is our highest happiness to work.

Hell is the evil and misery of our present life, and remorse at everything which continues it.

Revelation is the truth brought to light by science and history, and the record of such truths becomes the true Bible; its system becomes a Positive Philosophy, and its shorter statements the ever growing creed.

Such enlargements of the old names soon lift the translators out of the narrow creeds of an expected egoistic salvation into a higher and happier and more useful life, which is salvation.

Now, these hints must suffice. They show how the supernatural religion of revelation is squarely challenged and replaced by the Natural Religion of Science and Man, and that its most sacred names become more sacred by making them stand for our infinite universe, and the lot and fate of Man on Earth.

Short Notes on the Symposium.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just read in the issue of January 25th, with satisfaction, as a step in the right direction, your proposed symposium of Freethinkers on sundry propositions; and while I am not included in the invited class, it is difficult to conceive how a Freethinker can well be inhibited from participating at such a banquet. Therefore, please find the following contribution to the spread in event all plates are not covered.

Yes, there is an affirmativ, positiv, constructiv side to modern Freethought—not that it can be formulated into a creed in any sense in which that term is used.

In saying this we necessarily assume certain postulates. First, that every sane person during every wakeful moment is pursuing or seeking that which will, or as he believes will, bring to him now or at some future time the greatest possible good. Second, that the greatest possible good is not attained by the individual so long as he is conscious of another individual coming short of his ideal state of felicity.

Accepting, then, these postulates, the greatest possible good to the individual is attainable only by his striving—so far as it is possible with his powers circumscribed by hereditary tendencies and present environments—by all true, scientific methods to better his own condition physically, mentally, morally, and socially in all that those terms imply; not as an end, but as the rational (scientific) means for acquiring ability to better the condition of those around him.

If all human energy were thus expended it would eliminate all incentiv to avarice and crime in the sense in which those terms are understood to-day.

Reduced to a single expression, the affirmativ, positiv, constructiv side to Freethought is to, Strive to better your own condition and the condition of those about you, in contradistinction to that old dogma that has so long dominated, i.e., "Do all things to the glory of God." N. A. PARKER.

Frankfort, Mich.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Unless Freethought should lead to a knowledge of truth it has no merit that should entitle it to confidence or respect. Truth being affirmativ, positiv, and constructiv, if Freethought should lead to truth, it should hav no other than an affirmativ, positiv, constructiv side, and should be but incidentally destructiv, and should consist in proving all things and establishing that which is good and true.

Therefore, Freethought applied to the Bible should endeavor to ascertain the fundamental principle and final purpose of the Bible as a philosophy. Applied to theology, it should endeavor to ascertain to what extent, if any, theology has served to promulgate the fundamental principle and facilitated the final purpose of the Bible philosophy. Applied to important events in biblical history, Freethought should recognize the fact of the church of Christ being established about the time that Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea, as good circumstantial evidence that a Christ was crucified under his administration. It does not appear certain that the sorcerer who is said to hav called himself Christ, and to hav been stoned and hanged about seventy-five years before the Christian era, had any disciples. If he had, they could not hav established the church of Christ more than a hundred years later, when they should hav been dead and forgotten. The church record informs us that Christ was not crucified on his own account, for he was not found guilty of any offense against Roman law, but was crucified as a substitute for a noted robber by request of the Jews who threatened sedition if their request was not complied with. I think the Jews and Romans would be more likely to suppress all reports of such an infamous transaction than to make a record of it. Therefore, we should not reasonably expect to find any other than the church record of that event, and the church record is sustained by circumstantial evidence, and circumstantial evidence is always the most reliable on questions of historical fact.

When Freethought is applied to criticising the Bible, we should not omit a sentence that has an important relation to all the rest of the paragraph, for that will be an obvious perversion. When we read: "Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? for after all these things do the gentiles seek, for your heavenly father knoweth that ye hav need of all these things." If we stop at that period and assert that Christ taught indolence and indifference to our well-being on this planet, we shall perpetrate the most ridiculously absurd sophistry that blind bigotry could be capable of, and it will be apparent when we read the next sentence, viz.: "But seek ye first the kingdom of God and its righteousness, and all these things will be added unto you." That sentence should provoke the inquiry, Then; what kind of an institution should the kingdom of God and its righteousness be that it should giv us all things needful?

The suggestion of Paul to "own nothing but be possessed of all things," appears to be the most logical solution of that problem discoverable. That solution involves the entire abolition of ownership, and a brotherhood of man. A civilized brotherhood should logically involve collectiv sovereignty, perfect social equality, and coöperation by all for the mutual well-being of all. That should provide an abundance for all, and distribute abundantly to all.

Such being the kind of an institution that should constitute the "kingdom of God and its righteousness," I think it should be difficult to persuade intelligent and fair-minded people that Christ taught indifference to the well-being of man on this planet. The church having failed to "preach this gospel of the kingdom in all the earth, and to every creature for a testimony against them," as is her special duty to do, I think it expedient that Freethinkers should do so, and make it the fundamental principle of our Infidelity. That should be more destructiv of the superstition, hypocrisy, and arrogance of priestcraft than the popular Infidel literature is capable of being.

Conditions and Ideas.

My principal objection to all religions commences where they teach the existence of a God whose personality is as real and as set apart to itself as that of any human being of to-day or of the past—a personality as real as that of a living Napoleon Bonaparte or of a Julius Cæsar—a God or a person whose "hind parts" were seen by Moses.

My next objection is to where it is taught, directly and by implication, that there is an eternal life beyond the grave for every man, woman, and child born on this earth. In other words, that our presently destructible bodies of flesh and bone shall be after death bodies of a kind eternally indestructible, and hence not subject to hunger nor thirst, not cold nor heat, but nevertheless the personality of each one of us shall be as marked then as it is now.

One can conceive of the Pacific ocean being lessened by drops, but it is not conceivable how any part of time, whether it be of an hour or a billion of years, can encroach upon eternal time. And on the same principle it is equally inconceivable how believers in a life eternal for the personality of each and every man, woman, and child born on this earth can be wholeheartedly earnest in hastening a physical millennium for the living—a time on this earth when beauty and health of body will be our common heritage, and work a pastime incited by love of the living and unborn.

What is a little thirty or forty years' life on this earth compared with a life eternal in heaven? The thought of one is surely lost in the immensity of the other. To my mind there is no escaping these conclusions any more than that death-wounds will giv us more concern than pin-scratches. A believer in the life eternal may weep and wail at witnessing the living suffer, but he is inevitably consoled by the thought that the suffering will soon be exchanged for an eternity of bliss and joy that shall be fully as personal as the suffering was personal in the perishable body of flesh and bone. And right here is to be found his fatal weakness as a political and social reformer. To be completely logical in holding such a belief, he must put mankind immeasurably beyond the physical laws recognizably applicable to animals, hence his code of morality will be independent and outside of these known or natural laws. He must hold that a man's immortal soul or essence does not originate with an earthly father and mother, or originate in the sense that a man and woman of murderous and selfish instincts beget children with the same vicious instincts, just as the evil temper of a stallion and mare is repeated in their foal. Because it could be demonstrated that the most depraved men and women were to be found where subsistence was most uncertain and stinted. What need of stealing if we hav plenty?

Again, I object to teaching as a fact the existence of a personal God, because it is evil to teach as the truth something that cannot be plainly demonstrated as such, as is demanded for any other proposition before acceptance. Next, because God as the creator of all things givs him a personality so immeasurably superior to that of all men that the inequality between a pampered millionaire and a starving tramp becomes a mere nothing in comparison and in this way is a wide entrance given, on one hand to deification of individuals—your Vanderbilts and Rothschilds, and your kings and queens—and, on the other hand, to the abasement of the vast majority of the living who know not where to-morrow's bread is to come from. Ideas do not conform to acts, but acts do certainly conform to ideas. To act cowardly we must first be made afraid. Hence the source and cause of inequalities of condition between men must be sought in ideas or beliefs. In order that the truth shall prevail fear and selfishness must be eliminated from our minds. Self can only be held sacred to the extent where doing otherwise would entail evil to others. That sacredness of self, in order to avoid entailing evil to others, would demand a physical resistance or resentment to the death. Electricity has, in a moral sense, so joined all the world that a shock at any part is a shock to the whole. Through its agency the earth is peopled as by one community. To insure the happiness of the whole, for as long as the earth is habitable no personal superiority must be recognized except the right of endeavor to contribute most to the material welfare and happiness of the living. It is beginning to be recognized that a certain train of ideas or beliefs dispose men to be trembling slaves while other ideas or beliefs hav an opposit disposition. Hence the study of chemistry of ideas and beliefs is of far more importance than the study of chemistry of matter. It will then be demonstrated that the ancient Romans were wise beyond their times in estimating valor or physical courage as the greatest of virtues. There can be no one more practically fitted to enjoy life than one that holds physical danger in contempt to the very death. Such a person can sleep as sweetly as a babe, though snakes hiss and lions roar round about. Whatever such a person undertakes, we can be sure there will be no determent through fear of consequences to self. At the same time, such a condition of mind is safer for self than what is called "faith," because "faith" is dependent and hence may be disturbed or destroyed and leave its subject limp as a wet rag. Fear is paralyzing to mind and body, while bravery leaves you free to exercise your best powers in attack or defense. To the extent that death or danger is feared to that extent will the happiness of an intelligent man or woman be subject to disturbance. In fact, fear of any kind may be called an unmixed evil—where it prevails there will also prevail falsehood and treachery. Truth and fear cannot breathe the same air. Cowardice is the form of selfishness held the most in contempt; because it is liable to work more injury to others, in affairs of great moment, than any other form of selfishness. Through bravery alone can one retain full command of self. Literally, courage is life, while fear is death.

Men and women hav been known to die through no other cause than the feeling of fear, but it is not possible to imagin anyone dying through the feeling of courage. Yet, to gratify a pitiful vanity, many men continue, more or less directly, to encourage the feeling of fear in their women. It is now held that control by love, of the dumb brutes, even horses, dogs, etc., givs uniformly more satisfactory results than control by force or fear. Then, with their superior intelligence, mankind should also be more satisfactorily directed by love and be relieved from the immense waste involved in their control by fear or force, the latter system practically consuming one-half of the world as a police to the other half, as witness to-day the world over. It is the ideal that is true and everlasting and the "practical" that is fleeting and false, and to temporize with the truth and not to expect a moral death is as wise as to inject a drop of leprous blood into the veins of a healthy body and not to expect the whole body to become diseased. Truth supreme is perfect happiness to all the children of men, not as phantoms or impalpable shadows, but in their substantial bodies of flesh and bone, and we can only be sure of advancing to this condition when we are as sure of everyone telling the truth as we are sure of dying. Truth supreme stands to mankind as the sun to the vegetable kingdom. No lesser light will do for men. Under the present rule of force or fear truth is necessarily stabbed to death. Where everyone's subsistence is threatened, no one can be uniformly and consciously happy, a millionaire no more than a pauper, except by increasing degradation of mind and body, until the former becomes a Nero in cruelty and selfish waste, and the latter as meekly content to receive a kick or crust of bread as any unclaimed dog. Thus "the concern of one is the concern of all" becomes an apt expression of a great moral law, any violation of which evilly affects mankind as pervadingly and in degree as a body of water is pervadingly affected by disturbance at any part of it. The evil effects of the violation of a physical law, such as arise from the cutting of one's finger, are isolated and short-lived. It is fortunate that mankind has, as the Rev. R. Heber Newton says in the Twentieth Century, "one common perception of the mystic law of sacrifice." When dumb brutes giv up their lives to shield their young, we see in its crude and immediate form the operation of the mystic law of self-sacrifice. In the lives and works of Karl Marx, Darwin, Felix Oswald, Edison, and George Eliot, and numberless others, we see its operation in its human or far-reaching form. They are victors while, in bitterness of heart, the Jay Goulds or millionaires will find they are victims in spite of their sentinel-guarded mausoleums.

The ancient kings of Egypt built their colossal pyramids, but what of them and their people to-day? The memory of the former is buried in execration, and of the latter there is, conjecturally, a miserably besotted remnant. And yet these old kings, in their day, were worshiped as gods, in fact and in person, just as if we modern Christians should worship and erect temples or churches to the present emperor of Germany, because all Christendom had recognized in him the second incarnation of Jesus Christ or God. In these modern times, deification of individuals or self is going on through the prevalence of such ideas as are expressed in such terms as "vested rights." Our kings, in name and title, are mere puppets when compared with the real and far-reaching power of the many-times-millionaires like the Vanderbilts and Rothschilds. It is not good that such power should be permitted to the few over the many, or to continue such ideas and conditions as make it possible for one man to effect or disturb the subsistence of another.

In dealing with the problem of life, the most we can expect is to be able, finally, to avoid mistaking effects for causes or, in other words, avoid "putting the cart before the horse." If we find that certain ideas or beliefs, such as the belief in immortality or in personal Gods, hav been invariably attended or followed by conditions of ignorance, servility, or physical misery to the majority of their votaries, we can safely conclude that the cause is to be found in said ideas or beliefs, and hence, judged by their fruit, they are false. "Do unto others as you would others should do unto you," or "Love thy neighbor as thyself," express ideas that probably were improving in an age of brute force, a time when no one had a conscious perception of the mystic law of self-sacrifice. The ideas involved in such standards do not demand or incite to acts of heroism or self-sacrifice any more than the ideas involved in "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" do. "Love thy neighbor as thyself" would never hav called Leonidas and his three hundred to the pass of Thermopylæ, nor led Bruno to the stake.

But the ideas involved in "Love thy neighbor better than thyself," do demand and incite to acts of heroism or self-sacrifice, and hence are a conscious expression and recognition of "the mystic law of self-sacrifice." While, to illustrate an unconscious expression of said "mystic law," I will quote from one of Charlotte M. Braeme's novels, where she makes the heroin, Lillith Grayton, say, "I love him in the highest and best sense of the word. I would giv my life to make him happy. He will be happy with you, he never would with me, so I do my best to win back your love for him. I love him ten thousand times better than I love myself." This law knows no sex, and yet in "marrying for love," as it is termed, the majority of men are merely in the act of bending to its mystic influence, and as unconsciously as a hen when she confronts a hawk in defense of her brood. And I do not doubt that many of our noblest women hav been branded as criminals when in truth they were only unusually obedient to the mystic law of self-sacrifice. Because where it takes hold danger and threatening death merely add to its intoxicating force. To suggest thought of or calculation for self at such periods in one's life would be laughed to scorn.

Self must die that others may liv. "Self" is one; "others" are the unnumbered millions. A personal God is "selfishness" in its most acute form and hence the very nature of a belief in such is to encourage "selfishness" between men. Besides, any affirmation not susceptible of being scientifically demonstrated but to which universal assent is held to be paramount will, soon or later, be compelled to resort to fear or brute force or be jealous and obstructiv to science or material progress, and to this position the Christian religion has immovably and irrevocably betaken itself; hence, again, I object. When we consider that truth or knowledge is mostly acquired by slow and painful experience, it is evident that no vast accumulation of truth or knowledge can be fully utilized by the living until men and women speak the truth as universally and as irresistibly as they breathe. Preceded by such men and women we could safely eat where they had labeled, "Food," and we, in our turn, could then be free to contribute something additional for those that follow on the heels of our lives, and thus pay our debt to the past. Started on such a road, there is no conceiving to what extent knowledge would reach in the course of a thousand years, and from this standpoint, "speaking the truth" "for truth's own sake" becomes immensely "practical." Victor E. Lennstrand and Capt. Otto Thomson.

It is a fact worth remembering that the plurality of the foremost Freethinkers of both Europe and America are individuals who received, during childhood at least, a strict religious education, and who later in life through an examination of the Bible and a comparison of its teachings with those found in modern scientific works found themselvs drifting further and further away from the religion of "believe or be damned." Yet we need not be surprised. An impartial research will, to the seekers for truth, reveal the fact that science teaches the highest truths which the human mind at the time being can conceive of, that her path is the path of peace illuminated by the torch of reason, while that of Christianity is one of cruelties, wars, and bloodshed, over which the fire from thousands of Autos da Fé throws its cruel light and which is lined with the bleached bones of millions of victims.

But the battle is severe. Who can measure the throbbing pain, the mental anguish, which are experienced, when men are by their own inner self compelled to admit that what they deemed eternal truth is but a sham, and when they see sinking into the dust that mighty building which they believed would remain even when the Andes had disappeared into the Pacific ocean?

A will and a love for truth harder and purer than even a diamond are necessary. Yet when victory once is gained, what are the joys of a Christian heaven when compared to the peace and self-satisfaction of the individual victor? No heavenly choir can utter words grander and more sublime than the ones spoken by thankful future generations, when they are standing at the last resting-place of a martyr for truth, saying, "Here lies a friend, a benefactor of mankind!"

TRUTH SEEKER readers hav been informed of the war waged by a bigoted government against a little band of heroic Swedish Freethinkers, headed by Messrs. V. Lennstrand and Capt. O. Thomson. One might suppose such disgraceful persecutions to hav taken place in priest-ridden Spain, but never in the fatherland of the great Lindus, yet the latter is the case, and coming generations as well as every living Liberal man and woman will and do scornfully point their finger at the Sweden of the latter part of the nineteenth century; its authorities will be long remembered, but with feelings similar to those that the Catholic inhabitants of Netherlands regarded Sonoy.

Foremost among the Swedish Freethinkers stands Victor E. Lennstrand. This youthful martyr was born at Gefle, Jan. 30, 1861. Both of his parents, but especially his mother, who now is dead, were extremely religious. The intensity of Mrs. Lennstrand's religious feeling can best be comprehended when we know that she, previous to the birth of young Lennstrand, in a formally drawn "bill of sale," sold the latter "for the present time and all eternity to Jesus Christ to be his individual property and to be done with as he deemed best." As witnesses to this curious sale she calls in "God the father, creator of heaven and earth," the Holy Ghost, heaven's joyous inhabitants and hell's unfortunate spirits.

The childhood of V. Lennstrand was happy; his mother, "the best and most noble woman" he ever knew, did all in her power to make the home pleasant, and when on three different occasions he, during his early childhood, was seriously ill—once a measure of his coffin was taken—a more competent and loving nurse than my friend's mother could not be found. Night after night she sat at the bedside of her child, watching and praying, and at last he began to recover, as she used to say, "through the special dispensation and mercy of God."

After a few years of mental anguish, of sleepless nights and dark days, brought about by the uncertainty of salvation and fear of eternity, Victor Lennstrand gained, at an age of fourteen years, "peace in God." Full of youthful confidence and ambition he resolved to devote the rest of his life to the service of God by going as missionary to Africa. But, on being told that he was too young and ought to take the student's examination at the university before entering the foreign missionary field, he turned his attention to home missions, organized a Young Men's Christian Association, and became teacher in several Sunday-schools.

Until the year 1881, Lennstrand was a true Christian; he believed all, considered doubt a sin, partook in religious revivals, and spoke on several occasions in chapels and at prayer-meetings; but in 1881, the year he passed his student examination, he began to think. His reason called for proofs, he sought rational foundation for his belief, and resolved not to become either missionary or minister before every doubt had vanished—every question been answered. To arrive at this result he entered the University of Upsala as a student of theology, but here he became acquainted with the writings of Darwin, Spencer, Stuart Mill, Feuerbach, Haeckel, and others, the consequence of which, after several years of mental anguish, was, that he, in 1886, became an out and out Atheist.

The 25th of September, 1887, is a memorable day in the history of Freethought in Sweden. Then, on that day, in the great hall of Upsala University, Victor E. Lennstrand delivered his first lecture, "Is Christianity a Religion for Our Time?" The hall was crowded with students, and the applause both strong and frequent. The next day the police authorities prohibited a continuation of the lecture, and Lennstrand was called by the university faculty to answer to the charge of heresy brought against him. By sending in his resignation he anticipated the public dismissal from the university; his name was erased from the books, and he went to Stockholm, where he, during the fall of 1887 and the spring of 1888, delivered weekly lectures in which he attacked Christianity and the state church. The outcome of these lectures appeared on Easter Sunday, April 1, 1888, when the Utiliska Samfund was organized, with a membership of one hundred and eight individuals. During the succeeding summer and fall Lennstrand traveled through Sweden delivering lectures in various cities, an activity to which the bigoted authorities put a stop when they, on December 1, 1888, sentenced him to three months' imprisonment for blasphemy. Having served this sentence out, he continued his lecturing tour and was, in the time from March 1 to Oct. 28, 1889, seven times indicted for the same "crime," that of expressing his honest convictions. He is now serving a sentence of one year's imprisonment, but two judgments, for which he expects an additional year or two, are yet to come.

The lecture for which he is imprisoned now is published and sold in bookstores all over the country. The government dare not suppress or confiscate it. There cases touching "press laws" are judged by a jury, which it is feared will, as it has done on every previous occasion, declare Lennstrand

CAPTAIN OTTO THOMSON.

"not guilty," while public lectures are judged by the permanent courts.

In his prison Lennstrand reads whatever books he pleases, edits Fritänkaren, receives and answers letters, and is (what a mercy!) allowed to converse with friends every Sunday for a time of ten—minutes. Thanks to the liberality of friends, he is not condemned to sustain life on badly baked rye bread or water gruel, but receives his meals from the city.

The present outlook for our friend and brother in Infidelity is rather dark, yet, to quote his own words, in a letter to the author of this article, "Although our powerful antagonists, the masters of the state, do hope to annihilate our movement and crush out our spirit, yet they shall not succeed. Then we will sacrifice all that truth may gain her liberty."

In the person of Captain Otto Thomson, born in Stockholm Jan. 3, 1883, we meet with a totally different character. The captain is preëminently what we Americans call a "self-made man," and this in the best sense of the term. His parents were poor and the times hard, hence we see the young Otto Thomson, at the age of sixteen years, enter upon the vocation of a sailor and undertake a seventeen months' voyage, at the close of which he, in May, 1851, passed the steersman's examination with l'charactier at Stockholm's navigation school. Anew he took to the waves and sailed as steersman until the spring of 1857, when he presented himself as candidate for the degree of sea captain, and passed his nautical examination with honors.

Again the sea called him, and he, following her invitation, devoted two more years to commercial service, when he, in June, 1859, received a letter from home informing him of his father's sickness. He hastened to follow the summons, but arrived too late. The day before his reaching home his father had been carried to his last resting-place, leaving Captain Thomson to provide for a heart-broken mother and four children. The year following, when he intended to go to sea, he was fortunate enough to be offered a position as foreman in the Eskilstuna gas works, a place which he held for fourteen years, until the works passed into other hands. During this time the captain married and became a father. His family life was singularly happy for some years, but during second childbed his wife's mind became unsettled and she had to be removed to a hospital. After a short stay she was pronounced cured and returned home, but soon after suffered a relapse and began to look with aversion on her husband and child. This feeling became at last so intense that she had to be removed to the asylum. For Captain Thomson, who loved his wife dearly, it was the darkest period in life. Already, when a mere youth, the captain had become somewhat skeptical, a feeling which abated not when he, a few years later, read Büchner's excellent work, "Force and Matter." But force of circumstances, and the conviction that to carry on a successful war against superstition there was wanted a man who had made the subject of Christianity a special study, prevented him from taking the warpath.

But at last the hour came. The appearance of Victor Lennstrand, his lectures delivered in Eskilstuna during the fall of 1888, stirred up the mind of Captain Thomson to its very depths; then, as he himself says, "I felt, I had again something to liv and work for, and with the force and fire of youth I identified and connected myself with him and his cause."

Now the captain is the stanchest supporter that the Swedish Freethought movement can boast of; and his knowledge of men and events, acquired through a long and stormy life, his practical eye for business, makes him especially well fitted for his present position, that of organizer and business manager of Freethought in Sweden.

But the battle to be fought is severe and funds are scarce, while the enemy is strong both numerically and financially. Yet truth was never killed; she has a vitality of her own; even when burnt at the stake she, like a new bird phenix, rises from her ashes, stronger and more beautiful than ever. And when a new generation inhabits this earth, when the names of the prosecutors are either forgotten or remembered only as belonging to enemies of truth, then deep in the heart of the people and in the annals of liberty will be found the names of the Swedish Freethought pioneers, Victor E. Lennstrand and Capt. Otto Thomson. G. N.

Chaplain, Freethinker, and Philanthropist.

From the Boston Herald.

Once a careless Greek boy, at work in the fig fields of Smyrna, or at play in the arid streets of Malta, at another time almost called an adventurer in acting out the phases of his romantic life, and again one of America's most noted Abolitionists, and the father of the act that forever stopped the disgraceful flogging of seamen in the American navy, Photius Kavasales, the Greek, Photius Fisk the American. For thirty years a chaplain in the United States navy, yet since 1860 one of the foremost Freethinkers of the age, starting in life two thirds of a century ago, he dies leaving enormous wealth to Boston's poor after having distributed several fortunes among them. His life has been a succession of contrasts such as few men's lives present. The contemporary of Garrison and Phillips, the esteemed friend of John Quincy Adams, once president of the country, and of Abraham Lincoln; an intimate companion of John Brown of Harper's Ferry notoriety, and latterly the favored guest of Otto, king of Greece, the orbit of the social system of the subject of this sketch touches almost every decade of this century, and the most exciting and interesting features of this country's history during the present age are interlaced in the webwork of this man's romantic career.

Photius Fisk, whose ancestral name was Kavasales, died at his home on Washington street last Friday morning aged about eighty-three years. He was a full-blooded Greek, and was born in one of the islands of the Grecian archipelago, either in 1807 or 1808. He was removed in infancy to Smyrna, in Asia Minor, where his father was employed as an accountant in a mercantil house, and the Greek boy labored in the fig-gathering and fig-drying industry. In 1814, during a pestilence, he lost the father and mother who loved him dearly, and was deprived of the companionship of two brothers and two sisters. Himself infected with the plague, he found refuge in a Grecian hospital, where he was cared for by the people of his nation. An elder brother, Athanasius, residing at Malta, and an uncle were his only relatives.

His uncle, desiring to giv him the benefit of as much education as could be had, sent him to the only school of note at Malta, which was a Jesuit college, although the boy belonged to the Greek church. The Rev. Pliny Fisk, an American missionary, found young Photius at Malta and became deeply interested in him. He sought his family and persuaded them to let him take the boy to America under the patronage of the Board of Foreign Missions to be educated. Young Photius is found after a while at the school at Cornwall, and then for two years at the Hopkins Academy at New Haven, Conn. From the latter place he went to Amherst, but failed to complete his term, and he was sent back to Greece by the Board of Missions, leaving this country on the brig Statesman, Captain Bates, bound for the Mediterranean with a cargo of provisions for the starving Greeks, thousands of whom, at the close of their long and desperate struggle for Greek independence, were left destitute of even the necessaries of life. Photius landed at Malta a few weeks before the fierce and decisiv battle of Navarino, which gave a spectacular ending to the Greek revolution in 1827. After a series of adventures, in which the young Hellene suffered many privations, and at times hesitated between accepting commissions under Russian authority to oppress people of his own classic land and going forth an adventurer over the earth without any special destiny, he, having tasted of American independence, resolved to return to the United States.

From Smyrna he sailed for New York in a French brig and paid for his fare the last dollars that he possessed in the world, which he had borrowed from a Russian officer. The vessel encountered a series of severe gales, and the captain had to throw overboard a part of the cargo. She was freighted with figs and raisins. The voyage across the Atlantic had been so rough and disastrous that the brig put in at Martinique island, one of the West Indies, the balance of the cargo was discharged, and the captain decided to head toward South America, instead of continuing to New York. She was only a tramp vessel, and was off, leaving Photius at Martinique, before he could look for any redress. While waiting at this port for an opportunity to resume his journey to New York he was brought in contact with chattel slavery. This was a new experience to him, although in childhood he had heard the horrors of the Turkish system so often and so forcibly recounted that the most intense hatred of even the term slavery had become ingrained in his mental and moral being. When he did start for New York he stopped en route at Wilmington, where he saw the practical operations of the American system of slavery, which appeared to him worse even than it did at Martinique. At Wilmington he saw men and women unloading vessels at the wharves under the terror of the lash. His pity and his indignation were awakened by the wrongs inflicted by the strong upon the weak, and he declared in his own mind an uncompromising warfare against the whole system of slavery, and against the use of the lash upon human beings.

On arriving in New York he secured a place in a drug-store through the aid of the Rev. Girard Halleck, and while attending revival meetings he became imbued with a desire to study for the ministry. Willing hands took him in charge, and he was admitted in 1828 into the full fellowship of the Congregational church, and began to prepare himself for the pulpit. He afterward graduated at Auburn, N. Y., Theological Seminary, and was ordained at Halifax, Vt. He had charge of the Halifax church for a brief period, but he could not stand the intense cold of the Green Mountain state, and looked for pastures in a more congenial clime. In 1840 he went to Washington to preach, and there met ex-President John Quincy Adams, then a member of Congress, whom he had met in Boston in 1823, after his first arrival in this country, who had been a devoted friend to him from that time. The ex president took an activ interest in having Photius made a chaplain of the navy, and through his solicitations President Harrison, the grandsire of the present chief executiv, nominated him for the place, and the nomination was confirmed. At this time the newly made chaplain had a petition before Congress for a change of name from that of Kavasales to Fisk, the name of his first patron and foster-father. The petition was granted by Congress, and the president approved it.

In due time Chaplain Fisk was assigned to duty on board the frigate Columbia, which was commissioned for a three years' cruise, under command of Capt. Edward R. Shubrick. The vessel sailed from New York July 22, 1842. The captain was an owner of slave property, and nearly all the officers on board were from slaveholding states, and, save the chaplain, all on the frigate were supporters of the slaveholding system. Chaplain Fisk openly denied the right of ownership in men, and became unpopular among his fellows aboard ship. Another practice that aroused his pity and his indignation was the flogging of the marines and sailors. His tender sensibilities were often shocked by the undue severity of the punishment inflicted upon the enlisted men for trivial as well as serious offenses. It was of frequent occurrence for offenders to be stripped to the waist, securely bound to the gangway, with arms extended, and their backs lacerated with the nine-lash whip termed cat-o'-nine-tails. On his return to Washington after the three years' cruise he laid the whole matter of this system of punishment in the navy before President John Quincy Adams, Joshua R. Giddings, Henry Clay, and other influential members of Congress. A bill to abolish flogging was the result of his labors, but the measure was defeated in successiv sessions. Chaplain Fisk continued his fight for it, while all other officers of the navy of that day fought against the passage of the measure. Photius led the agitation against flogging and for the measure in press, pulpit, and on the platform. The negativ majority grew less conspicuous in each successiv year, until finally, near the close of the session in 1850 after four years' work, the long contested bill passed both houses in Congress in the form of a rider to an appropriation bill, which was approved by the president, and so became a law, abolishing the disgraceful custom. The following is a copy of the act:

For the transportation of the United States mails between New York and New Orleans, Havana and Chagres, and between Panama and some points in the territory of Oregon, $874,600. Provided: That no payment shall be made for such service, except in proportion to the mail service heretofore performed, or that may be hereafter performed; and that the secretary of the navy is hereby directed to make payments in such proportions only. Provided: That flogging in the navy and on board vessels of commerce be, and the same is, hereby abolished from and after the passage of this act.

Chaplain Photius Fisk afterward sailed on a three years' cruise on the United States frigate Raritan, and brought to Washington many botanic treasures, including the bulb of the wonderful oncidium papilio, which he presented to Superintendent Breckinbridge of the Government Conservatory. His next duty was at Pensacola, where, on account of his Abolitionism, he was held in great disfavor, and was not only socially ostracized, but was subjected to personal indignities on the street. He often contemplated the resignation of his office, but Congressmen Giddings and Charles Sumner, with whom he held friendly correspondence, counseled him to retain his commission, and wait patiently for the end of his shore duty.

In 1858 he was ordered to Washington and then to Boston, where he remained stationed two years at the Charlestown navy yard. Here he became intimately associated with Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Theodore Weld, Parker Pillsbury, and other Antislavery agitators. At this time he began the deep study of the works of Paine, Voltaire, Volney, Robert Taylor, and other noted authors of their class, confirming views which he had already formulated to himself. From this time he became one of the foremost Freethinkers of the country, and around his table gathered all the noted Freethinkers of his day. In May, 1859, John Brown was in Boston making secret preparations for his descent on Harper's Ferry. Chaplain Fisk became his intimate friend, and aided Brown with encouraging advice and with funds to strike his blow for the liberty of the colored race.

On the breaking out of the Rebellion Fisk was ordered to report for sea duty aboard the Powhatan, but his religious views had undergone a radical change. He resolved to resign, but Garrison and Phillips argued that as he would soon be long enough in service to be retired with a pension, he should hold on to his commission. He did so, and they appealed to President Lincoln in his behalf. Lincoln gave him a leave of absence, "during pleasure," with leave of absence pay, and in 1868 he was retired with the rank of captain. He made Boston his home until 1868, and then removed to Franklin, Mass., where he purchased a farm of thirty-six acres. His hospitable doors were opened to all, without distinction of race, color, or previous conditions. He had a large orchard of apples, peaches, and berries; the fruit he carefully packed and gave to charitable institutions. He allowed the poor of Franklin to take wood from his grounds, but after two years he gave up farming and returned to Boston and resided at the Adams House, and in later years he had lived at various boarding-houses in a modest manner, giving his wealth to the needy and distressed. The money he received all the years he was in the service and during the many years that he had been pensioned he invested in very profitable securities. He had given away during his period of residence at Boston $50,000. His favorit manner of giving money was to place deserving individuals on his books and allow them $10 per month. Many anecdotes of his generosity are told. Once, reading of a rescue of two men in a boat at sea, he immediately awarded $100 to the rescuers.

Deceased has left a great fortune, the extent of which cannot yet be told, and has bequeathed it to the deserving poor of Boston. It is to be invested and the income used.

In the disastrous epoch at which we are now arrived, we shall see the human mind rapidly descending from the hight to which it had raised itself. . . . Everywhere was corruption, cruelty, and perfidy. . . . Theological reveries, superstitions, delusions, are become the sole genius of man, religious intolerance his only morality; and Europe, crushed between sacerdotal tyranny and military despotism, awaits in blood and in tears the moment when the revival of light shall restore it to liberty, to humanity, and to virtue. . . . The priest held human learning in contempt. . . . Fanatic armies laid waste the provinces. Executioners, under the guidance of legates and priests, put to death those whom the soldiers had spared. A tribunal of monks was established, with power of condemning to the stake whoever should be suspected of making use of his reason. . . . All sects, all governments, every species of authority, inimical as they were to each other in every point else, seemed to be of accord in granting no quarter to the exercise of reason. . . . Meanwhile education, being everywhere subjected [to the clergy], had corrupted everywhere the general understanding, by clogging the reason of children with the weight of the religious prejudices of their country. . . . In the eighth century an ignorant pope had persecuted a deacon for contending that the earth was round, in opposition to the opinion of the rhetorical Saint Austin. In the fifteenth, the ignorance of another pope, much more inexcusable, delivered Galileo into the hands of the Inquisition, accused of having proved the diurnal and annual motion of the earth. The greatest genius that modern Italy has given to the sciences, overwhelmed with age and infirmities, was obliged to purchase his release from punishment and from prison, by asking pardon of God for having taught men better to understand his works.—Condorcet.

We hav a sort of family history of our god—so hav the Tahitians of theirs—and some old poet's grand imagination is imposed on us as adamantine everlasting truth and God's own word.—Thoreau.

The lecture at the Manhattan Liberal Club, 220 East 15th street, on Friday evening, February 21st, will be on "The Chinese Question," by Dr. Huldah T. Gunn.

Thoughts on Life.

Why am I living? What is my life? Whence comes it? Whither goes it?

A century ago I had no being. The world was moving on as it had moved on through countless ages, as it is moving on to-day. Myriads of human beings such as I am now inhabited this globe. They had thoughts and desires, sorrows and joys, pains and pleasures, such as I hav. They hav gone, passed away, out of sight, out of knowledge, out of memory. Such as they were, I am. Such as they are, I soon shall be. The life I hav was theirs. They held it each for his little span, then laid it down. Yet a little while and I shall resign it too.

The living die, but life ceases not. They are many. It is one. There is a death, a passing away from life, one living being less, but life is not diminished. There is a birth, an entrance into life, one living being more, but life is not increased. It cannot be lengthened, cannot be shortened, for it is eternal. There is no spot in all this vast universe where it is not, for it is omnipresent.

Why am I living? I liv in common with all nature, because I am. I exist in life, and life is me. I liv, not for myself alone, for then it were better I had never been. My life is not a unit, cast adrift upon the tide of events, to be swallowed up by the waves of adversity or gently floated upon the smooth waters of prosperity merely for my individual good or evil. The same life which animates me has animated, and will forever animate, all nature throughout unbounded space. I call it mine, but it is not mine. One day I began to liv, but life had no beginning. Very shortly I shall cease to liv, but life will never end. I am living because I am the form in which this omnipresent and eternal life embodies itself on this spot within space at this instant of time.

What is my life? The same life which has ever animated at one time and place one organism, at another time and place another. It acts upon the perfectly organized brain and form, producing the sound mind in the sound body. Again, it acts upon the diseased frame and the demoralized intellect, and sickness and crime result. But it is the same life, although it produces good or evil according to the properties and construction of the matter it operates upon. It is not the breath of a God, separated from its source and shut up within a tenement of clay. It is the all-pervading origin of form and order, which by its touch organizes matter, and compels it to act according to the character of the organization it has itself accomplished. It is the universal principle, which, working countless changes by all possible combinations of material objects, is itself unchangeable. Not perhaps itself intelligent, but the source of all intelligence in nature. Not conscious, so far as we know, of its own existence, but the cause of consciousness in all that are conscious. It is a principle as yet unknown to us, but not therefore necessarily undiscoverable by us, whose presence we can detect only by its influence upon matter sufficiently gross to be perceptible to our senses. It is ever and everywhere itself, though some call it life, some force, some nature, and others endow it with a pensonality and call it God.

Whence comes life and whither goes it? It comes not, goes not, for through eternity and universality it is. The living proceed from the living, and they liv, for life is in them. They die, but life does not depart. The conditions of their organizations hav become changed and life manifests itself differently under the changed conditions. On earth, in water, and in air there is no place where life is not. For wherever we pursue the search we detect the presence of the living. As we can only argue concerning the unknown from the known, it is reasonable to believe that in the thousands of worlds which appear to us but as little specks of light—in the millions more beyond our vision—life is not absent. Given matter with conditions essential to some kind of life, and that kind of life is there. Change the conditions and life remains, though the manner of living may be vastly different.

This is a grand, noble, elevating thought, beside which the exclusivness of a theology which imagins that for each man, distinct from all else in nature, was created a special mortal life, in which to win or lose a special eternal life for himself, sinks into groveling selfishness, and appears, as it really is, a system which, followed to its logical conclusion, can qualify its believers only for the cloister and the desert. I am in the world and of the world. My life is the life of all nature exhibited in me—the life of heroes and philosophers, of fools and criminals. From the highest to the lowest living being all are by equal right and necessity possessors of this one great principle. The living are all mortal and subject to many changes, but life is everlasting and immutable. And so, when my reason asks, "Why do I liv?" she answers herself, "I liv because there is one great infinit, eternal life, which ever has been and ever will be. The life of the wise and of the foolish, of the learned and of the ignorant, of the mighty and of the weak. The life of the human and of the so-called lower animal. The life of the flower and of the weed. The life of all the living everywhere. And of this great, infinit, eternal life I am the here and the now."

About the Manual of Morals.

The American Secular Union offers a premium of one thousand dollars for "the best essay, treatis, or manual, adapted to aid and assist teachers in educational institutions, professing to be unsectarian, to thoroughly instruct children and youth in the purest principles of morality, without inculcating religious doctrins." Commendable as this object in view, and the liberality of members of the Union, must necessarily appear to every person whose mind is not contaminated by prejudices of a religious nature, we, nevertheless, feel ourselvs compelled to express our opinion that its success might be, if not altogether frustrated, yet considerably delayed on account of some indefinitness and ambiguity of the language of the circular inviting to the contest. We are so much more reluctant and loth to find any defects in this most laudable and exemplary undertaking, because it stands isolated amidst that surprising indifference which has been characteristic of our country in regard to the development and stimulation of a true scientific spirit in it. Our people, namely, are exceedingly liberal, and they award thousands of dollars every year in prizes for cats, dogs, hogs, and to champion walkers, to bicycle riders, and even to the man who treats his antagonist in a slugging match with a most effectiv snoozer and in a most approved manner. But, it seems, they hav no money, or do not want to spend it either in promoting original scientific researches, or for good text-books. In Europe, on the contrary, thousands of dollars are given away by government and scientific societies for prize monographs, essays, original researches of a purely scientific nature, and for the best school-books. But no prizes are ever offered, at least on the continent of Europe, for boxing or for baseball playing. For these reasons, it was with unusual pleasure that we greeted the news about the offer of the American Secular Union, and looked upon this action as upon an inauguration of the scientific era, as opposed to the mercantil spirit of the present days.

In its invitation to the contest for an Agnostic Manual of Morality, the Secular Union leaves us in the dark as to whether Agnosticism is meant in its narrow sense, as merely rejecting the religious belief, or that it applies also to the scientific field, in the sense of its purity from prejudices and obscurantism. Science, namely, is apt to produce objectionable consequences the same as religion, if it is not purified from superstitions, servility, and the worshiping of spurious authorities. Without such a purification it may bring about very deplorable results, particularly in such a delicate and entangled question as that of morality, which, while losing its transcendental foundation in religion, is bound to look for a basis elsewhere, and may obtain from the science such a shaky one that the whole structure would not be able to stand on it for a moment. The uncertainty of the language used by the Secular Union, is most striking in the following paragraph:

> It is desired that the manual, for which this premium is offered, shall not be a reading book for schools, nor a mere code of morals, much less a system of ethical philosophy, but rather a concise, yet comprehensiv and suggestiv exhibit, with familiar and practical illustrations, of those universal foundation principles and axiomatic truths which underlie all sound morality and rightfulness, thus developing and educating that inherent moral sense which is more or less common to all rational human beings. In short, to show how to teach children the natural and essential difference between right and wrong, and the reasons therefor, without reference to sacerdotal creeds and sectarian dogmas, is the chief object to be kept in mind in writing for this premium.

The principal points at issue are: 1. Shall the manual adopt the unscientific hypothesis of a separate soul, existing per se, and, under certain aspects, completely independent of the body? Those who may think that it is a question of psychology and not of morals, and that therefore it can be easily avoided, will soon change their mind about it if they try to write upon ethics. This or that hypothesis will, against their wish, transpire through the wording of every sentence. The author will find himself under the necessity of speaking about some sort of immaterial entity underlying moral actions, their righteousness or viciousness. From history we learn that an independent soul was unknown to the fathers of the Christian religion during its early period and that it was invented later by them in order to bridge in some way over the chasm separating their transcendental deity from the concrete matter shaped into human beings. Subsequently it was adopted by all scientific flunkies, who took much better care of their body than of their hypothetical soul, and to whom their profession continued to be rather a means of making a comfortable living than a way of discovering truth. Even in our days this groundless assumption is rejected only by those who are true Agnostics in science as well as in religion.

The second point has reference to the moral sense of which the Secular Union speaks in the above-quoted passage. That moral sense is again an invention of a religious origin. It was, namely, conceived as a kind of appendage attached to the soul by the creator for the sake of helping man to distinguish right from wrong in a manner analogous to the instinct of animals which enables them to distinguish suitable from unsuitable food. Kant, whose principal object was to reëstablish faith in a supernatural God undermined by the critical spirit of the age and by the works of Encyclopedists, substituted for the moral sense his categorical imperativ, for which, though, he failed to find any rational foundation. This was the reason that his innovation was rejected, and the "moral sense," in the above indicated meaning, continues to be recognized by all those who stick to the soul hypothesis. By alluding to the moral sense, the Secular Union leads us to suppose that the soul hypothesis is not rejected by it. It is true that moral sense may be understood differently, and the unhappy term retained after it has been placed on a rational basis. But then, it would be desirable to hav this point established with sufficient clearness so as not to deter from competition those who, by their radical views, may believe themselvs already excluded by the above allusion of the program.

There is a third point, although of a different nature from the former, which I do not feel inclined to pass by without mentioning. It is relativ to the character of the whole work. If it is going to be a manual of morals for teachers, it must not be a didactic on morals, because one and the same work cannot expound the object-matter of ethics, and show, at the same time, how one has to teach it. Either one or the other. Of course there might be written two separate treatises, put under the same book cover. But then, the time given for its production is short; and besides, it would limit the competition to a very few men who, alongside with the cultivation of ethics as of a science, possess a thorough knowledge of theoretical pedagogic, and are, at the same time, experienced and successful teachers.

The Washington Secular Union.

Despite the long snow blockade, floods, washouts, and landslides on the railroads, the fierce winds and severe storms making it disagreeable if not dangerous on the sound; despite la grippe, which held so many of our delegates and ruthlessly seized the Rev. Mr. Copeland—so we got telegram of his inability to come just before time for him to deliver the opening lecture of the convention—despite an incessant downpour of rain during the three days and evenings of our meeting, the Washington convention of Secularists held at Seattle January 28th, 29th, and 30th was a grand success.

While hopeful of a larger attendance of delegates—each evening the large hall was crowded and great enthusiasm manifested—we had regularly elected delegates from only twelve counties, yet their ability and the earnest devotion to the purpose of the convention each and all manifested dispelled any feeling of disappointment and inspired all with hope and confidence.

Never was witnessed more earnest, intelligent discussion. In regard to each clause of the constitution, each fully and freely expressed and contended for his own opinion. Yet there was no majority or minority, for when a final vote on each clause was taken all were in harmony. During the sessions—the three days of the convention—the evenings alone were given to public lectures, the entire day being used by the delegates in perfecting the constitution and plan of organization. Only one difference of opinion arose calling for a standing vote. That was simply on a question of adjournment to dinner or continuing the work. The hungry ones were in a small majority, and the minority really enjoyed their defeat, thereby being enabled to enjoy their dinner.

When it came to the election of officers it was expected there would be such diversity of opinions that many ballots would be had before choice could be made, because the law just adopted in the constitution was most faithfully obeyed. No nominations for officers were allowed. Each delegate wrote on a ballot the name of the person of his choice for the office, and folded the ballot with the name written thereon covered, before handing it to the tellers. Nevertheless, all five officers, each separately, thus balloted for, were elected on the joint ballot. For president the whole 31 votes were cast for R. Winsor.

WHO CONSTITUTE THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

President, Hon. Richard Winsor, of Seattle. He was for fifteen years a senator of Michigan, is a very able jurist, a cultured gentleman of means and influence, an earnest practical worker for the secularization of our government, the very best and most able presiding officer I hav ever seen at any theological, political, Masonic, or any other kind of convention. Most emphatically, as president of the Washington Secular Union, the organization has placed the right man in the right place.

Treasurer George M. Boman, a self-educated man, the architect of his own fortune; a very able and successful business man, generous, whole-souled, energetic; with the courage of his convictions, quick perceptions, keen sense of justice, a heart easily moved by the recital of a case of injustice, sorrow, or need; has a clear head to advise and a ready, liberal hand to administer relief; modest, unassuming, yet, thanks to his indomitable energy and generous but most discreet use of means, we hav good reason to announce there will soon be "No exemption of church property from taxation in the state of Washington."

Directors-at-large. One elected from east, the other west of the Cascades. Albert Rosenow, of Walla Walla, has for two years held the office of vice-president of the Walla Walla Liberal Club, and has proved himself a power for good. His noble manhood, high sense of honor, and kindly, generous nature hav deservedly gained him the title of "the Prince" among all his host of friends at Walla Walla. Despite his pronounced Infidelity he is loved and respected by all who know him. An able, very successful business man, able reasoner, zealous worker, heart and purse devoted to maintaining "the flag above the cross."

R. J. Wilson, director-at-large for west of the Cascades. One of Seattle's most deservedly successful young business men. He has for two years been the energetic promoter and chief burden-bearer in the Liberal ranks at Seattle; full of the zeal and ambition of young manhood, doing what he does with all his might. He is rapidly, by his ability, integrity, and industry, attaining fame and fortune; yet even his very laudable desire and pride in business success cannot seduce him into neglecting a single opportunity to in any way work for or advance the cause of Liberalism.

These are in no sense flattering eulogies of these men, but simply a truthful description of their well-known peculiarities, testified to by all who know them—alike Liberals, Christians, and nothingarians. Their peers may possibly, their superior cannot, be found among the directors of any organization, either theological or political.

These, with the old, half worn-out warhorse, C. B. Reynolds, comprise the board of directors, executiv, and auditing committee, and hav the management and control of all affairs of the organization.

The secretary alone receives a salary. The amount is fixed by the board of directors: President, Hon. Richard Winsor; secretary, C. B. Reynolds; treasurer, Geo. M. Boman; directors at large, Albert Rosenow, R. J. Wilson.

The objects of the organization are the secularization of our government, to keep church and state forever separate, and "Our Flag Above the Cross;" while the specific objects are: To urge the adoption of such measures as are necessary to effect complete secularization of the government in all its departments [as contemplated by its founders] and secure to all full liberty of opinion on the subject of religion; to advocate taxation of church property; discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in public schools; repeal of laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; cessation of all appropriations of public funds for religious institutions or purposes; substitution of simple affirmation, under penalties of perjury, for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, feasts, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely secular government, and the adequate guarantee of public order and prosperity; and to afford benefit and protection to its members, so that in case of religious persecution, injury, or injustice on account of opinions held or expressed on the subject of religion, or for refusal to conform to any religious rite or ceremony, the coöperativ power of the united Liberals can more effectually be brought to bear in defending, securing, and maintaining the just and legal rights of its members.

Membership: Any person in sympathy with the objects of this organization may become a member by signing the constitution, and the payment of $1 each six months, in advance, by males.

Payment of dues is to be left optional with ladies, who become members with all and every right and privilege by signing the constitution.

All hav equal voice, power, protection, and privileges.

In every precinct where there are five or more Liberals, on becoming members of this organization, they may elect from their own number an executiv officer and representativ of this organization in that precinct.

And each and all executiv officers so chosen shall constitute the vice-presidents of this organization, and in all cases of religious persecution, injustice, or attempted deprivation of any member's rights and privileges shall be, and act as one of the board of directors, in the action of the organization in regard to all such matters that may arise in his or her precinct.

Resolutions instructing the board of directors to take prompt action in regard to the gross violation of our constitution by the House voting pay for services of a chaplain, and to early secure the incorporation of the organization; and of thanks to Miss Mattie Blaisdale for the very beautiful banner presented by her to the Union, and to Misses May Amunds, A. Hanson, and Jennie Houghton for the rich musical treat they so generously afforded—were all the resolutions passed. The delegates all preferred practical action to gushing resolutions.

The public sessions of the convention were held at Freed's hall on Ninth street. The speaker's end of the hall was adorned in the center by a large picture—a mammoth copy in oil of THE TRUTH SEEKER cartoon, "Uncle Sam and His Parasites," loaned by Mr. George M. Boman. Over it, in red, white, and blue, the motto, "Keep Church and State Forever Separate;" to the right, "Infidelity is Liberty, all Religion is Slavery.—R. G. Ingersoll," and to the left, surmounting a fine lithograph of Thomas Paine, "To Do Good is My Religion;" while to the right of the speaker's stand was a banner with the ever moral precept, "Subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. $3 a year, $1 for four months."

Music and trio by the choir, and the announcement that Rev. W. C. Copeland was suddenly gripped, and so could not deliver the opening lecture on "God in the Constitution," as advertised. Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds filled the gap, spoke on subject announced, and received the plaudits of the audience, after which Miss Jennie Houghton sang so charmingly—her clear, sweet voice filled the hall with melody, calling forth the rapturous applause of the delighted audience. This was followed by the most bewitching melodies by Misses May Amunds and A. Hanson, in a guitar duet, that was the very perfection of art, thrilling all with wonder and delight. Then Mrs. Krekel, in a few well-chosen words, presented a splendid satin banner in behalf of Miss Mattie Blaisdale, of Portland, Ore., to the presiding officer, in trust for the Washington Secular Union when organized, and called out and presented the fair and generous young donor.

Mr. R. Winsor, in his speech of acceptance and thanks, captured all hearts and was heartily applauded. Then the choir led, and all joined in singing "America," and were so enthused and delighted they utterly forgot the existence of La Grippe, or its victim, Rev. Mr. Copeland.

Wednesday evening, January 29th, the program consisted of a few pithy and humorous remarks by Dr. A. W. Calder, the able and efficient secretary of the Walla Walla Liberal Club, to whom the calling of the convention, and organization of the Washington Secular Union, was mainly due. Music by the choir. Song by Miss Jennie Houghton. C. B. Reynolds read a stirring, suggestiv letter of cheer from Mrs. Lois Waisbrooker, author of "Perfect Motherhood." Guitar solo, by the Misses Hanson and Amunds, which was rapturously encored, and lecture on "Thomas Paine," by Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, in which, in the language of the Eye, she eloquently reviewed the biography of and eulogized that patriot, reformer, and so-called Infidel, Thomas Paine, who has been so generally maligned by the enemies of progress and Freethought. After which the chairs were removed; the string band took possession of the speaker's stand, and gaily the dance went on till the wee small hours.

On the last evening, January 30th, a local paper says:

"Natural Morality, Superior to Theological Restraints as a Safeguard to Society," was the subject of an address on the last evening by Mrs. Krekel, of Kansas City, whose poetic eloquence was only surpassed by the logic of her incisiv arguments and the effectivness of her illustrations. She was followed by ex-Rev. R. Rawson, of Olympia, who gave a humorous account of his experience as a saver of souls according to the Methodist and Campbellite patent-rights, his disastrous debate with a young Liberal in "Arkansaw," and his final evolution into the Freethought ranks. Votes of thanks were extended to Miss Blaisdell for the beautiful banner, to those who had kindly furnished music for the meetings, to the various speakers, and to the Eye; and thus successfully ended the first annual convention of the state Secular Union.

About fifty crowded eagerly around the secretary's table after adjournment and succeeded in signing the constitution and paying the initial dollar. Our plan of work commends itself to every true Liberal, and demands their earnest, prompt coöperation.

Let vice-presidents be at once elected in every precinct, and let all take part in the battle, so that all may share the honors of victory. There is need of united action to right the gross violation of the state constitution by the house in the appointment of a chaplain to be paid from the taxes of the people.

If those who love liberty and justice will rally to the organization, Washington will become the banner state of Liberalism and our flag ever wave above the cross. C. B. REYNOLDS., Sec. W. S. U.

IF the truths of religion be necessary to all men, they ought to be clear to all men.—D'Holbach.

In Mother Nature's Nursery—A Little Fable.

"There, there!" said Mother Nature, "do be quiet, children. Havn't I told you before that if you are good children Santa Claus will bring you gifts on Christmas, and if you are disobedient and naughty he will punish you with a great switch?"

And she brought out a number of puppets and wooden idols and great piles of blocks and put the children all in different corners of the nursery, and set them building temples and houses and amusing themselvs with these little images.

But she had no sooner left them to themselvs than they all began quarreling together. "I am the oldest and I know the most, and ought to hav the most playthings," said Egypt angrily.

"We'll see about that. I'm the strongest and I'll fight for my rights," Rome retorted. So there immediately was a great hubbub, and when Rome had sent Egypt into her corner conquered, he turned his attention to the other children and began taking all their playthings and piling them in his own corner.

Then a number of little barbarians consulted together and grew very angry and envious because Rome had the sunniest corner and the most toys and had treated his companions so unfairly.

So, all together, they rushed at Rome, drove him out of his corner, knocked down his temples, broke his idols. In their place they built their own temples and set up their own images, and called themselvs Christians. And they grew strong and proud; there was only one stronger or prouder in the whole nursery, and that was the Turk. So they fought with the Turk until they were tired and the Turk was tired, and, finding that nothing was to be gained by quarreling with one so strong as the Turk, the Christians began fighting among themselvs, throwing blocks at each other and pulling down each other's houses and temples.

Mother Nature was attending to her housekeeping and her gardening, but when she heard such a noise and outcry among her children she ran into the nursery exclaiming:

"You naughty children!" and shut them all in the dark closet.

Then Mother Nature thought to herself: "These children of mine havn't faith enough in a far-off Christmas, or in an all-seeing Santa Claus, or in the gifts and the big switch, to behave themselvs.

"Instead of playing peacefully together, like loving brothers and sisters, they are growing to be wicked tyrants and weak slaves.

"They are too ignorant to obey my words and they are growing too big to play any longer. I must get them a teacher."

So she swept up all the blocks and toys into one corner of the nursery and brought books and slates and maps instead and hired Miss Science to teach the children the knowledge which it is desirable to know.

The children were glad to be let out of the dark closet and soon became fond of study. Some of the elder children seemed grown too old to learn, and some of the younger liked too much to go and play in the corner with the old nursery toys. But Miss Science is a gentle, patient, and careful teacher and she has a little wand on which is written, "Law," in golden letters. Whenever she holds up this little wand, order and obedience are magically restored to the school-room.

Mother Nature often says:

"I am glad my children hav so wise a teacher, though they murmur at the disciplin sometimes, and though sometimes I am saddened by their ignorance and evil habits, yet, after all, they are only children. I will trust to time and their wise teacher to make them useful and happy members of the great human family." MARY A. WORSWICK.

A Slight Error Corrected.

NEW YORK CITY, Feb. 7, 1890.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: In your issue of February 8th I see you hav fallen into a slight mistake in your reference to Mr. Crafts—bottom of the first column, editorial page. You refer to Mr. Crafts's having "accepted the challenge of the Seventh-Day Adventist representativ and subsequently backed out."

This is a mistake. I accepted his challenge and then he "subsequently backed out." In other words, he declined to comply with his own challenge to debate his own proposition, after his challenge had been accepted.

There is not the remotest possibility that any of those gentry can ever be brought to a public discussion of the merits of Sunday laws. They dread the public scrutiny.

Truly, ALONZO T. JONES.

THERE are few things more disheartening and disgusting than when you are walking the streets of a strange village on the Sabbath, to hear a preacher shouting like a boatswain in a gale of wind, and thus harshly profaning the quiet atmosphere of the day. You fancy him to hav taken off his coat, as when men are about to do hot and dirty work.—Thoreau.

IN the early church the interests of theology were too absorbing to leave any room for purely secular studies. If scientific theories were ever discussed, it was simply with a view to elucidating some theological question.—Lecky.

The Way to Expose Christian "Fakes."

A friend living in Kansas sends us this item from the Omaha Bee, strongly desiring to know the truth regarding it:

"DEATH-BED REPENTANCE.

"NEBRASKA CITY, NEB., January 30th.[—Special to the Bee.] —Ed Platner, an old settler and well known, who died two days ago, was during life an avowed Infidel and admirer of Ingersoll. He had a well-stocked library of books on this subject, was a well-read man, and never so happy as when arguing against the teachings of the Bible. On the day of his death, when he realized that his dissolution was near at hand, he sent for a Christian neighbor, whom he instructed to burn all his books on the subject of Infidelity, and a bonfire was accordingly made of them. Mr. Platner then called his family about him and warned them from the way in which he had led them, saying that he at last realized the great mistake he had made during his life."

Undoubtedly the story is what the daily journals denominate a "fake"—that is, the untruthful story of an unscrupulous reporter. However, some Freethinker may know of a Freethinking friend in Nebraska City who will devote a few hours to running it down. If not, some one who can regard such yarns seriously might write to the postmaster of Nebraska City, or to the mayor, or some other official.

Some Persecution by the Dominant Sect.

Probably no Christian will accuse THE TRUTH SEEKER of having an undue friendly feeling for superstition as exemplified by the various religions of the day. But at the same time that we criticise religion for its unreasonableness and for the tyrannical and inhuman acts it has inspired its devotees to commit, none can, we hope, accuse us of not maintaining the freedom of all mankind to worship or not worship, as shall seem best to them. It is not worship per se that should be opposed by law—though it should by argument—but the disposition on the part of the worshipers to override the rights of others to think for themselvs, and the disposition also manifest to make the community pay their bills for worshiping. This disposition is so distinctivly opposed to what hav become known as American principles that to oppose the churches is now synonymous with upholding liberty and Americanism.

The recent decision of the United States Supreme Court that Mormons are not eligible to naturalization, and that when two years ago Idaho passed laws practically disfranchising Mormons it was within the limits of the Constitution, are surprising decrees, and they are all the more open to objection when every Christian journal in the country chuckles over them and maintains their beneficence. That most unrighteous Christian paper, the Independent, calls the last opinion the "hardest blow yet," and adds:

"Now the result of this latest finding will be, first, that Idaho will enter the Union under a constitution which forever debars from the polls every one of the thirty thousand 'Saints.' And, second, Congress can scarcely fail soon to take note of what the Supreme Court has done by so enlarging the scope of the Edmunds law that in all the territories not to repudiate and forsake the polygamous society will be to forfeit American citizenship. Reform to the point of revolution must also soon ensue, or else fatal disintegration will befall."

If the court's decision was only a blow at polygamy, we could safely say that it was not without the province of the court to render it. Under our national and state statutes, persons convicted of crime can be disfranchised, and as polygamy is a crime, polygamists can be made amenable to such laws. But to disfranchise the Mormons because they are Mormons opens the door to the disfranchisment of any sect whenever its opposers shall hav the power to pass such laws.

Allowing for the sake of the argument—and we hope that our individualistic friends of Liberty, Fair Play, Twentieth Century, et id omne genus will not try to push us down their logical wells for the allowance—that polygamy is a crime and rightly punishable, why should all the Mormons be made to suffer for the sins of a few? Why should religion be made the condition of voting instead of polygamy, if this prohibition were not the persecution of a sect instead of a few criminals? We hav not the statistics of Idaho at hand regarding the number of polygamists in the territory, but it is not to be supposed that the percentage of plural marriages, with the law on the statute books referred to in the court decision, could be as high as in Utah, and in that territory, in 1882, only twelve thousand people were or had been living polygamously. Additional evidence found in Ex. Doc. No. 447, first session of the Fiftieth Congress, as to persecutions for the crime showed that between April, 1885, and September, 1888, four hundred and fifty-three persons were convicted. Further statistics also show that less than two per cent of the Mormons are polygamous in their social relations. This is an absurdly small percentage upon which to base the disfranchisment of a whole people, and shows that there is undoubtedly another motiv behind the ostensible regard for virtue of our Christian neighbors. Under the pressure of civilization polygamy was becoming extinct. Under the pressure of Christian persecution there is an evident determination to extinguish the Mormons themselvs.

If Mormonism could be suppressed by reason, no one could rejoice more than the advocates for liberty, for under its hideous influence men and women hav debased themselvs about as low as it is possible for the human mind to descend. They hav been and are but mere tools in the hands of their priests. But so hav other sectarians, the Catholics, the Oneida Communists, and others. Still, the Catholics hav not been disfranchised, and we hear of no attempt being made on their liberty. Yet a Protestant minister the other day contributed a long argument to the Christian Statesman to prove that the Mormons as Mormons, and not as polygamists, held no tenets so subversiv of American principles as do the Roman Catholics. And, away back in the time of John Adams, the second president of the United States, the same views were put forth, but with the true counter statement. Under date of May 16, 1822, John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson these words:

"I do not like the late resurrection of the Jesuits. They hav a general now in Russia, in correspondence with the Jesuits in the United States, who are more numerous than everybody knows. Shall we not hav swarms of them here? In as many shapes and disguises as ever a king of the gypsies—Bamfield Morecarew, himself assumed? In the shape of printers, editors, writers, schoolmasters, etc. I hav lately read Pascal's letter over again, and four volumes of the history of the Jesuits. If ever any congregation of men could merit eternal perdition on earth and in hell, according to these historians, though, like Pascal, true Catholics, it is this company of Loyola. Our system, however, of religious liberty must afford them an asylum. But if they do not put the purity of our elections to a severe trial, it will be a wonder."

No one who is well informed in the history not only of the Jesuits but of the Catholics at large, will dispute John Adams's estimate of that sect. But, under our system of religious liberty, we must afford them an asylum; though we should see to it that our laws do not permit them such property exemption as shall so enrich them that they can by bribery "put the purity of our elections to a severe test." Let the Catholics vote, but do not let it be so that by their votes they can rob and tyrannize the people.

The Mormons hav done but one thing that the other Christian sects hav not, and only a small percentage of them hav committed that crime. Their religion is thoroughly Christian, and embraces faith in an alleged God and his alleged promises, repentance, baptism for the living and the dead, confirmations, ordinations, endowments, washings, anointing, signs, prophecies, revelations, Sunday-schools, prayer, tithes, offerings, sacrifices, and "in fine every ordinance, gift, grace, principle, practice, doctrin, precept, blessing, hope, assurance, and labor ever enjoyed by the apostles, prophets, and saints of the Old and New Testaments." And that includes polygamy, and that is where the shoe pinches. The Christians cannot confound the Mormons in a biblical argument for their practices, and so exhort the civil power to subdue them. It is very much as in the time of Bruno when the "learned" doctors of the church could neither confute him nor force him to abjure his opinions, and so he was turned over to the temporal power with the recommendation to punish him without shedding of blood, which meant the stake! There is, however, some slight progress indicated in the difference between the punishment then and now!

There is no doubt that the Mormons, through their absolute slavishness to their hierarchy, are a disagreeable people to liv with, and that the same slavishness puts the hierarchy astride the necks of the non-Mormons. But if Salt Lake City is a worse-governed or more priest-governed city than New York, the information has not yet reached these parts. Go to the city hall here any pay-day and see the black-garmented sisters waiting for their share of the city funds through the medium of Irish gentlemen who draw three times the salaries they could ever hope to earn in any business outside of politics. Even the day laborers on the streets are not exempt from the religious beggars, and their charity is not asked as a charity, but demanded as a right. Doesn't the Roman church own Tammany Hall? Doesn't Tammany Hall own the city just now and provide good Catholics with lazy situations and large pay? Why then should the church not hav her share? So all the city employees render unto God the things that are Cæsar's, and Cæsar may help himself if he can! That is what they voted for.

When Puritanism controled the country, it was the same, only the minister instead of the priest owned the country. And it will ever be so when any sect is numerically strong enough, unless there are safeguards erected which shall prevent it. In his latest encyclical the pope defines the duty of the Catholic to love his country and to love his church; the church to be loved more ardently than the country. If the laws of the state contradict the divine law, and command anything prejudicial to the church, or hostil to the duties imposed by religion, then it is a duty to resist them and a crime to obey them. This, says a Protestant paper, is but the restatement of the old "higher law" with which we were familiar in the days when William H. Seward defined that higher law and declared the irrepressible conflict. The pope further says that the church approves all governments that respect religion and divine law, and is indifferent to parties in the state. But if, however, the church, that is the Catholic church, is in danger, he says the divisions of parties should cease and all should unite to defend their religion, and that we must not fear to resist iniquity lest we exasperate the enemy. That is the Catholic doctrin. The Protestant doctrin is the same. "All these propositions are good enough," comments the same Protestant paper, "and no Protestant can find any fault with them. There is no Protestant living worthy the name, who would not resist and resent interference of the state with the exercise of his religion, and who would not put the kingdom of God before any kingdom of man." So! But when the Mormons desire to exercise their religion in their own way—leaving out polygamy, the Protestants disfranchise them! Freethinkers are punished by blasphemy laws! Seventh Day Adventists are punished with Sunday laws! These laws are but the tearing down of all safeguards, and they are torn down completely when one sect can influence the government to persecute another sect, and it is all the more dangerous when an excuse is made which is calculated to deceive the great body of the people, whether that excuse be polygamy, blasphemy, or the preservation of the "Sabbath." Americans can never be induced to go into a religious persecution if they know what it really is. "You can fool some of the people all the time; you can fool all the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time," said Lincoln. Americans will see through this Mormon persecution by and by, and then the Christian church will not stand any higher in their estimation. "The hardest blow yet will" be a boomerang to bump the Christian church's own forehead.

A Woman's Journey Around the World Alone.

A great many people think that the recent trip of "Nellie Bly" (Miss Cochrane) around the world in a few hours less than seventy-three days is something wonderful. This might, indeed, be the case if she had done anything wonderful except catching trains on time, but the whole scheme was an advertising dodge for the World, and Miss Bly had her way made clear, and she only earned her money.

The truth is, it is now perfectly feasible and safe for any woman in good health and possessed of common sense to make the journey. Madam Ida Pfeiffer began traveling in 1842, and spent several years in visiting the places of interest of the world, going twice around the globe, without touching a point on her second journey which she had visited on her first tour. It is not to be supposed that Madam Pfeiffer accomplished this without some thrilling adventures. Once she was set upon by a negro in Brazil, and badly cut before she escaped. She fell into a river swarming with alligators, and was made prisoner by Cossacks and held until they were satisfied of her harmlessness. In Sumatra she was seized by cannibals, and only her own tact and courage saved her from immediate death. Since Madam Pfeiffer's time, however, conditions hav changed. Civilization has spread over almost every part of the world, and the traveler who seeks adventures like Madam Pfeiffer would hav difficulty in finding the savages and cannibals, and would probably be forced to charter a special steamer to take him out of the beaten tracks.

Next to Ida Pfeiffer's traveling record is that of a beautiful young woman in whom the Liberals may be allowed a special interest—Lilian Leland, the daughter of Theron C. Leland, now deceased. Like her father, Lilian too is a Freethinker. A few years ago, at the age of twenty-five, without premeditation or preparation, Miss Leland started upon a voyage which, unexpectedly, became the commencement of a journey which carried her around the world, to many lands and on many seas, from Cape Horn to the North cape and from the Rocky mountains to the Himalayas; but little less than sixty thousand miles in distance and covering a period of about two years. She traveled without escort or protection except chance acquaintances met on the way.

Like Isabella Bird, who is the third woman traveler of the world, Miss Leland has written her experiences in a book, which a news company has just published, perhaps with the idea of taking the wind out of Nellie Bly's sails, as nautical people would say. Certainly she has gone to windward of her in great shape, to borrow more seafaring slang. The story of Miss Leland's travels makes a book of nearly four hundred large pages, put into the form of letters written for the entertainment of the family circle who watched her progress with affectionate interest. These letters are a record of personal experiences, interspersed with observations and thoughts of the writer. She did not fill her epistles with statistics and guide-book facts, but tells us what the countries through which she traveled are in the eyes of a young woman who has a ready appreciation of all that is human. It is this which makes her book attractiv, while her unconsciousness that she was doing any wonderful thing emphasizes the difference between her and the recent aspirant for glory.

As was to be expected of Theron C. Leland's daughter, she has written many things in her book avowing her heretical tendencies. In Rome she visited St. Peter's church as a matter of course. "I walked up and down its great aisles twice," she says, "and surely in bigness it exceeds everything. I looked up at the immense statues of past popes with hands outstretched as if in benediction, with expressions of holy love on their stony faces, and with statues of women gazing adoringly up at them, and I thought: 'I used to hav a regular nightmare of a book called the 'Book of Martyrs,' and there's a picture I hav seen of you in Naples, and in both book and painting your regular business appears to hav been lighting martyr fires, plying red-hot pincers, and enjoying the agonies of the unfortunate on the rack. Oh, I've seen you before in your red gown and lace jacket and bellows hat. This great church of yours is a colossal monument to a bloody era of martyrdom.'" In Lilian's eyes the Maddalena of Titian is "fat and red-headed and dejected," and while she looks at it and the vast canvases of other church paraphernalia for stirring emotion in the worshipers, the words of Mark Twain, which hav gained him the earnest ill-will of all good Catholics, come back to her. "Some seventeen or eighteen centuries ago," wrote the Connecticut humorist, "the ignorant men of Rome were wont to put Christians in the arena of the Colosseum yonder and turn the wild beasts in on them for a show. It was for a lesson as well. It was to teach the people to abhor and fear the new doctrin that followers of Christ were teaching. The beasts tore the victims limb from limb and made poor mangled corpses of them in the twinkling of an eye. But when the Christians came into power, when the holy mother church became mistress of the barbarians, she taught them the error of their ways by no such means. No, she put them in this pleasant Inquisition and pointed to the blessed redeemer, who was so gentle and so merciful toward men, and then urged the barbarians to love him; and they did all they could to persuade them to love and honor him, first by twisting their thumbs out of joint with a screw, then by nipping their flesh with pincers, red-hot ones, because they were the most comfortable in cold weather; then by skinning them alive a little, and finally by roasting them in public. They always convinced those barbarians. The true religion properly administered, as the good mother church used to administer it, is very, very soothing. It is wonderfully persuasiv also. There is a great difference between feeding parties to wild beasts and stirring up their finer feelings in an Inquisition. One is the system of the degraded barbarians, the other are the ways of the enlightened, civilized people." The imaginativ pictures and the material relics of Catholicism impressed our Freethinking heroin as they did Mr. Clemens. "I admire," she concludes, "the old Paul Veronese and Tintorettos for their size and the work put upon them, if I don't admire their subject—the last judgment, with its attendant devils and toasting-forks and lakes of fire and writhing victims—not agreeable pictures to me, but ones that, it is alleged, giv great pleasure and satisfaction to the all-seeing eyes of a merciful God and all good people who love him, as well as to people of cultivated artistic tastes." At Antwerp, where an exposition was being held, the same great fault of nearly all European galleries could not be hidden—the "frightful pictures of martyrdom and crucifixion. Wherever you look, the eyes and brain are seared and the soul is wrung with the painted horrors of religious history. I turn away and try not to see, for I know they will come back to me at night and haunt me with their misery and the knowledge that it has all been suffered even as it was painted. But the hideous nightmares will start up and confront me from every side till I am ready to cry aloud against the church and the religion, under whose auspices such diabolical savagery grew and flourished."

In Russia, the nightmare pictures were supplanted by a reality equally strong against Christianity. "O holy, dirty Moscow!" is the exclamation that naturally occurs to a visitor. "Everywhere you see shrines and dirt. Opposit the holy gate is a corner where every pious citizen turns in four different directions and crosses himself and mutters prayers to four different shrines, and kneels to each, while the busy throng, having finished their devotions, swarm by intent on business. Russia is dirty, her people are likewise. Moscow is especially so. But it is a holy land and a pious people. There are plenty of rich churches and poor people. Religion, poverty, ignorance, and dirt go hand in hand—might be called concomitants of each other. The most ignorant and oppressed countries in the world are, I believe, also the most church-ridden. America is the most radical and the most civilized country in the world. Russia, Ireland, and Italy are but little in advance of heathendom, which is only a grade lower in ignorance, superstition, and dirt than Christendom, for none are so deeply religious as the heathen. In St. Petersburg, as well as Moscow, our drivers were forever taking off their hats and crossing themselvs as they drove past shrines and holy places."

There is much more in Miss Leland's book worth quoting to giv a true idea of what real orthodox Christianity reduces nations to, as well as to show what the eastern countries are at the present time, and how civilization and commerce hav redeemed them from the barbarism of religion since the time of Ida Pfeiffer. It is owing to these two forces that Miss Bly found railroad trains and ocean steamers which she or anyone might catch and so make the journey providing only that they first obtained the means to purchase the tickets. Miss Leland's "Journey Around the World Alone" was much more useful and entertaining and just as wonderful. An acquaintance with her of fifteen years or more prevents us from applying the last expression to her trip, as she is perfectly competent to take care of herself anywhere, as any self possessed and well-behaved woman can in civilized or even half-civilized countries.

True, too True!

The American Sentinel says:

"The Freethinkers profess to be decidedly opposed to Sunday laws everywhere. Yet THE TRUTH SEEKER reports from 'a friend' in the Washington legislature, the following words:

"'A majority of both houses are really Freethinkers, but many of them are also politicians, and would make no break that would hurt their politics; but yet I am in hopes, and encouraged to think that I can get through a Sunday law that will be quite liberal. I am convinced that the majority of the members would prefer none, but for policy's sake, we will hav to hav something.'

"The politician takes precedence of the Freethinker there. The Freethinkers are much like many other folk with whom they find so much fault. THE TRUTH SEEKER very properly remarks, that 'comment on that state of things is almost superfluous.' The American Secular Union needs to hurry along with its one thousand-dollar prize manual of 'the purest principles of morality.' It is much needed in the Washington legislature just now."

We hav to agree with our Seventh-Day Adventist contemporary that the political Freethinkers of the Washington legislature need a moral manual—and some of them need it badly. The friend, however who furnished the information is not one of them.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL has become a kind of household necessity to Liberals and Freethinkers. Besides containing the regular calendar it is a kind of annual resumé o the work and the growth of Liberalism. The present number has, as had all its predecessors, many good, kind-of-documentary articles.

We hav read the most of this ANNUAL with unusual interest. Brother Macdonald, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, appears to hav gone into nearly a year's search after a spirit and several times came near finding one, but finally gave it up in despair. Once, we think he would hav found one had it not been for Dr. Slade's unfortunate left leg. Macdonald appears to be, and evidently is, sincere, yet in his long search he discovered nothing convincing to him.

Hugh O. Pentecost's reasons for leaving the church show him to always hav been a man of integrity and devotion to principle.—New Thought.

MR. EDITOR: I am very well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, pictures or no pictures. I cannot get any subscribers. F. SHOPBELL.

TEMPE, ARIZ., Jan. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Do not stop the pictures. I will try to send a new subscriber. The grand work for the cause of humanity must go on. L. H. HAWKINS.

ROBINSON, ILL., Feb. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed see $3.75—$3.25 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER and ANNUAL, and the extra fifty cents says I vote to keep Heston's genius in action. P. GRIGG.

BIG TIMBER, MONT., Jan. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: We like the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We hav lots of fun and wars in discussion with our Christian neighbors over them. S. B. ROBERTS.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $5.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL. We all like the pictures very much. Long may they wave. J. N. POWELL.

CARBON, TEX., Jan. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find the money for another year and the ANNUAL. I was induced to subscribe for your paper for the benefit of the pictures, and will stop when they stop.

Your friend, I. A. DINGBY.

CIMARRON, COL., Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I will try to get you another subscriber soon. I do hope the cartoons will be continued. They will cause many to investigate that would otherwise pass the paper by.

Yours truly, J. C. WILLIAMS.

BALTIMORE, MD., Jan. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. This new subscriber favors the pictures, and is not afraid to show them to his friends. They show up the fabulous stories better than words. E. LIVEZEY.

HOUGHTON CO., MICH., Jan. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6, for which send me the inclosed list of books, etc. The balance apply as my Part-on the pictures. Repelling as they are, I want some more. HARRY S. BEESLEY.

CORNING, O., Jan. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Although my subscription does not expire until March 16th, I do not wish another copy sent to me after this date, January 20th. The influence of the cartoons is far from desirable. DR. JOHN W. FOREAKER.

NEWARK, N. Y., Jan. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.25. I will say in regard to keeping the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, by all means continue them, as they show up some of the church fallacies and frauds. WM. H. H. STEBBINS.

MT. VERNON, MO., Jan. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I tried my best to get you a new subscriber, and failed, so I do the next best thing, pay for two years. I like the cartoons and want them continued. Heston is a brick. I wish we had a million like him. Z. C. DENNEY.

BRIGHTON, N. Y., Jan. 20, E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: I think Mr. Heston's pictures are interesting and getting better in style. I send $1.50 for Heston's pictures, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, and twenty-five cents for the Ingersoll and Field debate. E. C. CURTIS.

MADISON, O., Jan. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I did think I should get you some new subscribers, but through the influence of church-going people and Mrs. Grundy I hav not succeeded. Let us hav the pictures by all means. Call on me for $1 rather than hav them omitted. LOWELL CRANE.

STOCKTON, CAL., Jan. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your paper for eight years and could not do without it. You may consider me a life subscriber. We all like the pictures. I think they are grand. By all means keep Mr. Heston at work. He could not be beaten. Long life to you. T. J. POPE.

LE ROY, KAN., Jan. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been on the crippled list for the past three years, unable to roam the country, and sincerely regret I cannot send you many new subscribers. The cartoons are appreciated, applauded, and recommended by all to whom I hav exhibited them. A. V. COFFIN.

COOKRELL, COL., Jan. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As to the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I would not like to see them stop, for I think them a great benefit to the paper, but I hav not been able to get any new subscribers to keep them going. But I sincerely hope you will be able to keep them up. J. J. DURKIN.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Jan. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $7 for two new subscribers and a renewal. I would hav renewed before, but was working for some new subscribers, and as Jehovah has an enormous majority in this town, they are hard to get. Hold on to Mr. Heston. I think him a mighty warrior.

Very truly yours, C. WRIGHT.

GOWER, MO., Jan. 15, E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1890, or rather, 290 E.M. Let the pictures continue to preach; they are witty and pointed. I am solitary and alone in my town in being outspoken for the downfall of superstition. "On with the dance."

J. W. HUTCHISON, M.D.

NEW YORK, Jan. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose herewith my check for $3. Please forward THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to the new subscriber whose address I inclose. I wish to add my vote for the continuance of the illustrations by Mr. Heston, and will try to secure more subscriptions to further the cause.

Very truly yours, CLEMENT J. CHALLAR.

COOK, NEB., Jan. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $10 for renewal, a new subscriber, the ANNUAL, and $1 for the pictures. I think they are doing an immense amount of good, more than double the amount that any reading-matter could do in the same space. Liberal brothers, let us not hav the pictures taken out. W. B. BROOKS, M.D.

NORTH YAKIMA, WASH., Jan. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: If we can spare any picture, it would be the one on the front page. It is necessary that the foolishness of the Bible should be illustrated, so we could not well do without the back-page illustrations. I will be prompt with my part of the subscription, so that you need not fail on my account. JAMES A. BECK.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA., Jan. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find stamp for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. In regard to the cartoons, giv us more of them, or each week giv us a picture of some great man. It is almost impossible to get you a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will giv you a few names of persons that ought to be readers of some Liberal paper. FRANK EVANS.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Jan. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $5 25—$3 for a new subscriber and $2 25 for nine ANNUALS. We send two votes for the pictures. They must not be left out. They speak volumes. They are a holy terror. As Brother Peck says, Heston is "on the warpath," and I for one want him to keep the armor on. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and Heston. E. H. GAULT.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., Jan. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I do not wish to take up any spaee in your valuable paper, so will merely say in regard to the illustrations that I fully concur with Ella E. Gibson and hope for the continuance of the work of Watson Heston. Inclosed is $17 for six new subscribers, and ANNUALS and books and engravings, as below specified. WM. MCDONALD.

UNEKA, MINN., Jan. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5.50 for one new subscriber and my subscription. I make no comments, and I think it shows a more Liberal spirit than this saying, "Stop my paper unless you stop the pictures," and, "If you stop the pictures stop my paper." May the truth liv until the story of the baby in the manger is of the past.

Truly yours, W. S. KING.

LYNN, MASS., Jan. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please giv my kindest regards to our artist, Mr. Heston, and my sympathy to those poor unfortunates who hav made an attempt to be Liberal but find the pictures too true for their orthodox ideas. I vote to hav them continued by all means. Inclosed find $3, with name of a new subscriber, who also votes in favor of the pictures.

C. E. AMES.

NIPOMO, CAL., Jan. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Both Mr. Fry and I are decidedly in favor of the cartoons. There are no new subscribers to be found in this little village or surroundings, but if the pictures can go on I will send $1 for the sake of helping along. However, if they hav to go it will not cause me to giv up the good old TRUTH SEEKER. Keep them in if you can, by all means.

Truly yours, JOHN ROBINETT.

CORVALLIS, ORE., Jan. 13, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $5.25 for subscription and ANNUAL. If the worst comes to the worst and you cannot send the pictures and printing, why, send the pictures without the printing, as the pictures can be read by those ignorant of printing, while all, both great and small, who read the pictures, smile while their comprehension is being expanded. B. F. HYLAND.

RYAN, IA., Jan. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to a new subscriber. I am much rejoiced to see the fund for sustaining the illustrations growing so rapidly. I am proud to hav been one of the first to set a good example by contributing $1 toward a fund for their support. Let every reader do his best to obtain a new subscriber. I hope that all who are unsuccessful and feel able to do so will contribute $1 to insure the continuance of Heston's valuable illustrations, which we cannot afford to lose.

Yours for enlightenment, ARTHUR I. FLINT.

KEOTA, IA., Jan. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I muster myself with the ninety-nine against one for continuance of Heston's sparks, so find inclosed $3 for THE TRUTH SPREADER (not merely SEEKER), and fifty cents penalty for not rolling up the new subscriber; ill health keeps me prisoner at home. How does genial Heston nourish his brain? Has the brimstone treatment by the clergy such happy results? May the Philistines never cut his hair. CHARLES NAUMAN.

RUSSELL, PA., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find twenty-five cents in stamps to pay for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER the best of any paper that I take. I could hardly get along without it now. I think the pictures are just the thing. Do not stop them if you can help it, as I should hate to see the old TRUTH SEEKER without them—but shall take the paper just the same. M. M. SADLER.

PAULINE, ARK., Jan. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I will send you a new subscriber soon. As to the cartoons, let them be continued by all means. They certainly assist the paper in demolishing superstitious orthodoxy. I look upon them also as a test of genuin Liberalism. With me I think a Liberal who opposes the cartoons for fear of wounding the Christian feelings of some person is not sufficiently impressed with the injurious effects of orthodoxy. W. R. BACHELOR.

GEORGIAVILLE, R. I., Jan. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. Since reading R. G. Ingersoll's "Vindication of Thomas Paine," I hav made up my mind that the Presbyterian organ, the Observer, is edited by a lying, beastly coward. I enjoy the cartoons. It is like pulling teeth to get subscribers in this place. But I will cast in my mite for the good of man whenever I can. The crows will not feed me, as they did Elijah of old. WILLIAM A. BENNETT.

ASPEN, COL., Jan. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Well, I hav secured two new subscribers. Of course we are all in favor of the pictures being retained in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I may be able soon to send you two more. I will do the best I can. There are a good many Liberals in this town, only we need some good Freethought lecturer to "round us up." I hav heard of different ones being in the state at different times, but for some reason they do not come here. FRED. B. MOSES.

GARDEN VALLEY, TEX., Jan. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I want the pictures kept in the paper, and will pay the forty cents remaining as balance from the inclosed $5 to help remunerate the company therefor. I hav had the promis of three new subscribers, but the insects hav nearly destroyed the cotton crop in this section for the last two years, so those persons cannot spare the cash now. will do all I can to extend the circulation of the publications of your and such-like establishments. A. S. BIGGS.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Jan. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $20 from O. T. Davis, of Brighton, for the support of Watson Heston, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Liberalism. Friend Davis desires me to say to you that Heston's pictures are a powerful educator, and will hav more effect than volumes of printed matter; that they are not coarse, vulgar, unsightly, and misleading, as some hav stated; that it would be very difficult to portray anything more untruthful than the subject-matter that the pictures represent. R. BUTTERFIELD.

ROBINSON, ILL., Jan. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $10—$5 for renewal, $1 for "Men, Women, and Gods," twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, and $1 for the pictures; the balance please place to my credit. I take a good many papers, but I think THE TRUTH SEEKER ahead of them all. It givs all creeds a show—Jew and gentile, Methodist and Catholic, even the old mossback Presbyterian can hav his say. I think the pictures are just grand. I do not see how I could do without them. I hope to be able to send in a few new subscribers.

J. M. JEAN.

Jan. 19, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish my vote registered as one in favor of the continuance of Brother Heston's illustrations, and substantiate same by inclosing $1 to be applied to the donation list for said purpose. I say, keep the pictures going, and long may Brother Heston liv to furnish them. If we are right, we cannot proclaim it too loudly or spread the truth too fast. Ridicule such as Heston's pictures will never hurt our cause. There are lots of people living yet who cannot read, and such pictures showing the absurdity of the Bible and recent observations, will teach more and better lessons in one year than ten years of reading. A TRUTH SEEKER.

NEOLA, IA., Jan. 19, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed a check for $8.50, to renew my subscription for 1890 and for three new subscribers. I hav worked hard for two days to get one more subscriber, but failed. This town has nearly five hundred inhabitants, of which nearly one-half take no stock in theology, and as little in anything else except making money. There are many that are just as bitter opponents to theology as myself, but I believe I am the only one at present that takes a Freethought paper or exhibits any desire in the promulgation of Freethought. Continue the pictures by all means. They show up the inconsistencies better than words can. It is only the tenderfoots that object. D. W. WHITNEY.

TRENTON, TEX., Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send $5, for which send me the "Field-Ingersoll Discussion," the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and use balance on my subscription. I hav already noticed that our higher order of intellect hav been opposed to illustrations and pictures in general, and cartoons in particular, but why, I cannot tell. Certainly nothing appeals to the higher taste of the beautiful in art half so much as our modern art of representing great and mighty truths with that two-edged weapon, the cartoon. Mr. Heston possesses genius in that direction which gladdens my heart.

Truly yours, DR. W. C. HOLMES.

MEMPHIS, TENN., Jan. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav at last succeeded in securing you a new subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I consider the best paper I ever read. The pictures are the great feature of the paper, and should be continued by all means, even if the subscription price should hav to be increased. I frequently show my Christian friends the pictures, which tell them at a glance a great many things they could not be persuaded to read about. I will do my level best to try to secure you more new subscribers, although it is a hard task in an orthodox steeped city like Memphis. I also send you twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890. J. WILTON.

THOMPSONTOWN, Jan. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4—for the continuance of THE TRUTH SEEKER $3, for the ANNUAL twenty-five cents, and seventy-five cents in favor of the pictures for the year 1890. But this is sadly all. I am hand in hand with you upon the great question, Freethought. Gladly would I send you many subscribers. But I am living in a hot-bed of Christianity. Were I to solicit subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER every effort would not only prove a failure, but a slice off myself—socially, bread and butter, and business generally. Knowing no names worth giving you, I deplore the bigotry and Christian ignorance surrounding me.

Yours, etc., JAY F. HALDEMAN.

WARREN, O., Feb. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your valuable paper for two years, and I could not get along very easily without it, for it is my Sunday Bible, and its pictures are appreciated. My wife is not a Liberal, but she always is the first to look at the pictures, and she appreciates them, and so I will vote for them. But if they cannot be continued I would not giv up the paper. I thought I might get you a subscriber, but I am not very well acquainted here in Warren. I hav been here only four weeks and I hav learned that there are only three or four Liberals here, and they get THE TRUTH SEEKER. But I will do all I can to help the cause along.

CHRIS. BECK.

QUAKERTOWN, PA., Jan. 19, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for the one ANNUAL received, and for the balance send three more ANNUALS. My opinion is that the illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER should be continued, and I will either send you a new subscriber or $1 soon to keep them going. I should indeed be sorry if they were discontinued, as I could not get half the young persons to look at the paper that I can with the illustrations. I might write a lengthy article in favor of the pictures, but will desist. Having been told by two Protestant Christians that I should be killed for my unbelief, I am not anxious to keep the pictures out of their sight for fear of hurting their godlike feelings. D. C. WISMER.

SILVER PLUME, COL., Jan. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find in the shape of two new subscribers and orders for ANNUALS, some votes in favor of continuing the pictures. I would rather see the paper cut down in reading matter than lose the pictures. Those "Liberals" whom they offend had better get an illustrated Bible to read. Probably Heston's cartoons are as nearly correct as those in the Bible. The preponderance of evidence goes to show that they (the pictures, not the Christians) do more good than harm. Your real good Christian that would not look at the pictures cannot be converted anyway; but there are a great many that only need to see them to become interested, and so go to reading when they would not otherwise do so. A. B. CLARE.

BANGOR, ME., Jan. 19, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity in my family. I should feel very bad to hav the pictures left out. They tell many times as much as that amount of reading would. Who is it that the pictures hurt? It must be some weak-kneed Liberal, or some goody-good Christian. If the pictures shock them, let them go and get their dear old Bible and read a description of them, or some other story they can find there—if they are at all familiar with their Bible—which Mr. Heston would blush to make a picture of. I cannot be counted as a voter, for I cannot send a new subscriber and hav not the extra money to donate toward the pictures, but hope those who hav will giv liberally enough so you will be able to continue them, for I think it would be taking steps backward to leave them out. Long may the good old TRUTH SEEKER flourish with the pictures kept in.

Respectfully yours, MRS. SARA E. GOULD.

DES MOINES, IA., Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send you two new subscribers. I am glad to know you hav awakened the subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am pleased to note the work they are doing. I, myself, hav been sleeping, as it were, but when you spoke of leaving out the pictures I felt that we could not and must not let them go. They speak for themselvs and no person can help laughing at the absurdity of the stories they tell. It is hard for Christians to see anything funny in them, but let them follow the pictures up week after week and they forget it is wrong to look at them, and by and by they are as anxious to see THE TRUTH SEEKER as any of us. It sets them to thinking, and that is what we want. I hav done nothing toward getting subscribers. The two I send I got for the asking, and I am satisfied that with a little effort I could get a number more. I will try, at least. On a separate sheet I send a list of Liberals, to whom you may send sample copies, as requested. R. B. CARTER.

BLOOMDALE, O., Jan. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I take great pleasure in handing you $5.25—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the balance for the books enumerated on the inclosed slip. In reference to the pictures, I here add a few ideas. They instruct and amuse in the briefest manner, notwithstanding the lack of art, which I think Mr. Heston fully adequate to supply. In reproducing such matter it becomes necessary to be uncouth. Christians do not heed our feelings; why should we refrain from telling the truth or showing it in pictures? I vote, Yes. I am on the lookout for subscribers. You ask for the names of possible Freethinkers. I send you inclosed some that I fancy may subscribe. I think shortly to be successful in getting some added to your list. If not, you will always hear from me favorably. If my purse was as plethoric as my wishes are good for Universal Mental Liberty, you should hav a boom from here. C. C. GERMANN.

MUCHAKINOOK, IA., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: This New Year's morning I gathered up what TRUTH SEEKERS were lying around and started on a calling expedition, distributing as I went to such as I thought had intelligence enough to appreciate. I got the promis of two new subscribers, and will try for more. That effort will show how we like the pictures, and that they attract more than they repel. My wife declares with every new copy that "That man Heston ought to hav his throat cut. He ought to be hanged. He ought to be burnt," etc. But, she must read the pictures before any of us can see the paper. So when you announced that the pictures would hav to be discontinued for want of support, great was the lamentation in this home. So, if need be, I will chip in to the amount of $1 to help continue the pictures. Inclosed find $5.25. Giv me credit on your books for $5 until further orders, and use the twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. GEORGE PENMAN.

FABLINVILLE, KAN., Jan. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3 25 for subscription and the ANNUAL. I hav been a subscriber from the first, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is a household necessity, and I do not see how it could be improved. I hav sent you some subscribers at different times, and hav tried hard to get some now, but hav failed. I do hope you will get the necessary support to continue the pictures. I think they are excellent. My orthodox friends always want to see the pictures, and after looking at them they generally read some, and if it were not for the pictures they would not touch the paper. I hav one of your pictures, "The Modern Balaam," on the wall at my place of business, where scores of men see it every day, and it is talked about more than anything else. Now, if I had one of John Peck's articles, excellent as they always are, posted up there, it would not be noticed by one man where fifty examin the picture. H. E. DEWEY.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Jan. 19, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As you request our opinions as regards the illustrations of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will say for myself, and also am authorized to say for Mr. Thomas Goddard, that we are highly in favor of their continuance. I would especially refer to many remarks made by the opposition, but, after maturely considering how diversified the minds of men and women are, and that the only remedy is a growth in the knowledge of the laws by which we are governed, I discover the task too great for one of my age and condition of health. I am also sorry to see such a seeming dissension among our brothers and sisters in regard to the work of the American Secular Union. I cannot secure a new subscriber as yet, but as my friend Goddard and myself recently made a pretty liberal order for books, etc., we will try in the near future to make another in order to assist as much as possible. Find inclosed fifty cents for two copies of the ANNUAL for 1890.

Fraternally, WM. A. THOMPSON.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Jan. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read with deep interest all John E. Remsburg's witnesses say about Lincoln being a Christian, and every witness this able scholar brings to testify seems to confirm beyond doubt the affirmation that our martyred president, who put a shining band of friendship around the states, was not a Christian, but was the outgrowth of all the noble qualities of heart and brain that conspire to make a genius. I believe the cartoons are accomplishing a splendid work—a work words fail to do. And could a cartoon possibly be made to show the fiendish work the Christians hav done, by bringing together all the countless millions murdered in the past, the beholder would vow that while they lived they would do all in their power to hasten the happy day when freedom, justice, and human love will be the only stars that shine in the intellects of the human race.

R. R. JONES.

OMAHA, Feb. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You hav invited your readers to giv their opinion as to the picture-lessons. You hav kept the pictures free from anything that is vulgar or immodest. One look to a boy will impress his memory more than ten lectures could do. A glance takes in the comic and ridiculous. Giv the pictures to the boys. To them we must look for our strength in the future. I consider one boy as worth ten old petrified Christians that hav a thin coat of Freethought, but too gauzy to hide the petrifaction. They are the ones that are so sensitiv about hurting the feelings of the Christians. The person that claims to be with us and whines out that way has a very tender heart, but a much more tender head. Pictures get a boy to examin the Bible about the pictures, and then he is not quite as ready to swallow all that he gets in the Sunday-school from the holy sky-pilot. I hav given you my ideas about the pictures, and inclose $5 and leave you to say if I am in favor of pictures or not. If so, apply the "V" to pictures. S. H. S.

HURON, S. D., Feb. 4, 290.

MR. EDITOR: The new subscriber I sent, myself, and all who borrow my copy to read, I think will vote early and late to hav the pictures continued. My copy of the paper goes into many hands and gets pretty thoroughly worn out. I know the new readers of it are very often first attracted to it by the pictures. That was the case with the new subscriber I sent in and others that I hav loaned the paper to, who would many of them subscribe if they were financially able to. As you hav called for an expression of the opinion of its friends in regard to publishing the pictures, would it not be well to call for a vote on the question of publishing stories? I hav always been interested and instructed by every number of THE TRUTH SEEKER for over ten years, but am free to confess that during all that time if a serial story had been published in it, probably the story would hav been the first thing I would hav read upon picking up the paper. At the same time I would know that there were other articles in the paper that would probably do me more good to read and that would giv a keener enjoyment.

Very truly, E. W. CROUCH.

HAMILTON, Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I notice with interest the letters you are receiving from the friends of your paper, especially in relation to the pictures, and among them I notice one lady who in expressing herself on the subject of the Heston pictures says they are so immodest she covers over the paper fearing her children will be corrupted by seeing them. Does this lady also cover up her Bible to prevent her children from seeing the vile, vulgar, obscene scenes and stories recorded in her loved book all the way through from Genesis to Malachi? If she does she is sensibly modest, but if not her carelessness in leaving her Bible exposed to her family and then covering up THE TRUTH SEEKER so as not to be seen, seems like "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel," for I am not aware of there being in circulation in the English language a book containing so many passages and stories of an obscene nature as there are in that book. I hav found one man that will subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER April next, at a time he is to receive his money. He wants the pictures.

CARLTON RICE.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Feb. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wrote you that I would pay $3—an additional subscription—toward defraying the expense of continuing the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER. To repeat, my "promis to pay" has always a cash value, especially when it is greatly needed in destroying the worst system of religion that ever cursed humanity. I hate it. I execrate it with all my being more and more every day I liv, and I shall never giv it one moment's rest. If I could afford it, I would, instead of contributing $3, donate $300 in this much needed missionary work, in behalf of our liberties. So please find inclosed $3, for which please send me an extra copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER each week, which I will, on its immediate arrival, mail to the address of some person who will greatly welcome it and where it will do good missionary work for our cause. I will circulate it around among my large acquaintance of men on my two thousand miles of territory traveled over, first to one, then to another. By this mode of missionary work I hope to do even much more good than by getting a new subscriber. L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Jan. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find an "X" to bring up my subscription on the noble old TRUTH SEEKER; and send me the ANNUAL, the "Champions of the Church," and the balance in such tracts as you think best for distribution, and I promis you I will distribute them to the best of my ability. By no means discontinue neighbor Heston's pictures. They are worth more than their space in reading. Think of them offending! Why, if I were a Christian and believed as they say they do, I should hav my walls covered with illustrations of all the hideous acts that I credited God with. Think of worshiping a merciful God who has slaughtered millions and then being shocked at seeing his holy word and actions illustrated. Why, Christians should hav pictures on their walls of children starving at their mother's breasts; of bears tearing the flesh from their limbs and devouring them for having a little fun at an aged gentleman's expense; of their God ordering the first-born of each of their families slain; of men at God's command slaying fathers and sons and turning over daughters to the soldiers. If I were a Christian I would hav all these and thousands of others in my house, while I would sit down and with a broad, self-satisfied grin on my face ask Mr. God to please giv me the good things I needed and make it hot for those that could not shut up their mouths and open their ears and take in all the slush that their well-salaried sky-pilots and hell-pedlers chose to pour in their ears and ask no questions. Pictures or no pictures, I want THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I assure you I should feel as though I had lost one of my best friends if they were to be missing. The first time I get anywhere near Carthage I want to stop and giv my neighbor and friend's hand a good shake.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Mice and the Cheese.

[Dear Miss Wixon: The other day my wife's aunt repeated to my little granddaughter the following lines of a fable she had learned in England sixty years ago:]

Three mice, having met in a hole in a cheese,
Where they nibbled and figured away at their ease,
Began a discourse about this thing and that,
And at last, very naturally, spoke of the cat.
Said one, "If I had her fast tied with a string,
With a hearty good will both her ears I would wring."
The second one said, "Were I strong as a bull,
Her nose without mercy I surely would pull."
The third one declared he was longing to tell her
He'd "kick her the next time she entered the cellar."

[This was all she could remember, but as the child was very anxious to know the rest of the story, our aunt has kindly composed the following sequel:]

The cat, from her perch on a high upper shelf,
Peeped over and laughed long and low to herself.
"Oh, oh! my fine fellows," she said in her glee,
"What a jolly good supper I'll make of you three!"
(Now, puss, I am sorry to say, was inclined To rather broad language in speaking her mind.)
"You impudent rascal! you saucebox, who'd wring
My ears long and hard, were I tied with a string!
Your ears and your head I'll hav off in a trice,
For cats make no bones in their dealings with mice.
You boastful young scamp who would fain be a bull,
That my nose without mercy you surely might pull,
If it comes to pull noses we'll see, of us two,
Which will pull to most purpose, and 'twill not be you.
You poor little weakling, with legs like a stick,
Who think you can hurt me by giving a kick,
I'm half tempted to spare you till later, but, no,
Down my throat with the others you'll presently go."
Now, a night on the housetop, instead of in bed,
Had given Grimalkin a cold in her head;
And just at this moment an unlucky sneeze
Caused a panic below to the mice in the cheese.
Helter-skelter they tumbled, one over the other,
Each one for himself, with no thought for his brother;
Rolling head over heels in their fright and their flutter,
They landed all three in a tub of fresh butter;
But out again quickly, with squeal upon squeal,
Each one feeling surely the cat at his heel,
They scudded along o'er the rough cellar floor,
Just in time to spring into their hole near the door.

The cat, who felt better, had now, with a bound,
Alighted quite close to their hole in the ground,
But only in time, with great fury, to see
The tip of the tail of the last of the three,
As they vanished below from the light of the day,
Leaving pussy to sad meditation a prey.

She stood there awhile, then, as if in a dream,
Turning slowly around, spied a dish of fresh cream.
Soon full, but not happy, she sighed once or twice,
Then fell in a doze, still bewailing the mice.

Now, the moral, dear children, is clear as the sun:
Never boast of your doings until they are done.
Even then 'tis much better to modestly say,
"I've done what I can in my very best way;"
Leaving others to judge, at least, those that are able,
If you've profited aught by this plain, simple fable.

[Now when this is printed in The Truth Seeker Aunt Sarah will read it to my granddaughter and other little ones.] W. H. Burr.

Astronomy.

"Oh, what's the use of having one word sound so much like another?" exclaimed a little girl, who had innocently stated that a man stood on a parallel, instead of a parapet. "It mixes you up so!" It does indeed, and the results of such mixing are every day apparent, in forms more or less amusing.

"You will always be prettier than I," said the same little girl to her sister, "because your hair grows so even, and mine turns up in a cow-catcher."

One day the conversation turned on astronomy, and one and another member of the family pleaded ignorance of all but the most elementary knowledge of the science.

"I know the Pleiades when I see them," said one, "but I've forgotten how many stars there ought to be."

"I recognize the Dipper," said some one else, and at this point the youngest member of the family broke in:

"And O'Brien!" cried she. "Don't you know O'Brien, with his sword and belt?" Some of them thought they did, though under a slightly modified name.—Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

Heber City, Utah, Jan. 29, 1890.

Dear Miss Wixon: I hav never written to the Corner before. My father has taken The Truth Seeker for twelve years. I hav read the Children's Corner quite a bit and am very much interested in it. The snow is about all gone in the valley, but it is deep in the mountains around us. The roads are very muddy now. Four days ago there was good sleighing.

I will close, wishing you all a happy New Year. Your friend, J. W. Lindsay.

(Twelve years of age.)

Belding, Mich., Feb. 3, 1890.

Dear Miss Wixon: I thought I would write a letter for the Corner. I hav been sick for three weeks with the measles. I go to school and study reading, arithmetic, spelling, physiology, language, and writing. Our teacher's name is Miss Smith. I am ten years old. My papa has taken The Truth Seeker for a long time. He has a great high pile of them. My papa and mamma and graudma hav been sick with la grippe.

I think I hav written enough, so good-bye.

Luella Webster.

North Huron, N. Y., Feb. 4, 1890.

Dear Miss Wixon: I see the little girls' letters in The Truth Seeker, and I thought I would try to write one too. I am eight years old and I go to school, and my schoolteacher's name is Erveing E. Richardson. The term will close in three weeks. I hav a kitten and a pet chicken and a bird. This is my first letter. I will try and do better next time. Bertha E. Weed.

[Bertha has written a nice little letter and we are glad to welcome her to the Corner. We shall be pleased to hear from her again.—Ed. C. C.]

Fabius, N. Y., Feb. 10, 1890.

Dear Aunt Susan: I wrote a letter to the Corner which was published Feb. 8, 1890. I sent my post-office address, but it was not printed, and I felt so bad about it I almost cried, for I thought that if any of the boys and girls wanted to write to me they would address to Cedar Lake, which is not a post-office, but only a lake near our home. I thought I would write to the Corner to correct the error as soon as possible. I thank Aunt Susan for her pleasant remarks.

Don't forget to write, boys and girls. Good-bye. Your Freethinker friend,

Elda S. Billings.

St. Elmo, Tenn., Jan. 25, 1890.

Miss Susan H. Wixon: I hav just received The Truth Seeker for Dec. 14, 1889, in which I learn of your election to the school board of Fall River, Mass. Let me congratulate you. Although it is so long ago, The Truth Seeker says the hue and cry was set up to defeat you; that you would instruct the children that "there is no hell."

That reminds me of an album verse that I wrote for a Methodist preacher a short time ago:

I suppose you hav somewhere seen or heard it read,
That away down in his heart the fool has said,
"There is no God." By the same token
The wise man says it with his mouth wide open.

Another:

There is no God. Now, do not quake.
There is no heaven but that you make.
There is no ghost, there is no elf,
There is no devil but yourself.
There is no hell to do you ill,
But that you fashion as you will.
There is no reward in form of pelf,
There is no savior but yourself.

L. L. Goodwin.

[Thanks for your interest in the Corner, and for kind congratulations. May you soon recover from your ill health, liv long, and prosper.—Ed. C. C.]

About Asphalt.

Dear Children of The Truth Seeker Corner: As, perhaps, many of you are acquainted with asphalt, and also with asphalt pavements, and as you might not know where the asphalt comes from, I hav thought for some time now to giv you a description of the Pitch lake of Trinidad. Trinidad is a small island on the northeast coast of Venezuela, South America. It is about seventeen hundred and fifty-four square miles in extent, and contains about one hundred and ninety thousand inhabitants. The Pitch lake, or great asphalt deposit, is situated in the southern portion of the island, at a point called Point La Brae, on an elevation, at about one mile inland. The lake is about one hundred acres in extent, and its appearance is that of a dull, still, dark waste—atra regna. Its shape is an irregular circle, and its surface appears convex, being more elevated in the center and declining on all sides. In the center also the asphalt is very soft, hardening as it approaches the sides. Except where the asphalt is soft, the surface is intersected by large fissures, varying from two to sixteen feet. These fissures are at all times filled with water. In some places, where the asphalt is mixed with clay or earth, may be found growing mosses, lichens, and other tropical vegetation.

The center of the lake is called the chaudiere, and is at all times so soft that it is impossible to approach near it without incurring the danger of being engulfed. On nearing the center one sees and hears a constant bubbling and puffing, accompanied by emissions of gaseous substances and the throwing up of a yellowish mud, quite cold and of a bitter saltness. At early morn the whole surface of the lake except the center is hard, but at midday it becomes so soft that it retains the slightest impression of the lightest impress. Whenever any asphalt is dug from the lake the hole left is soon filled up, and a perfect level is restored in about twenty-four to thirty-six hours. Any material substance of any weight disappears when placed on the soft asphalt in the center. The operation going on in the center may be compared to the ebullition of a thick substance in a large boiler.

There is an Indian tradition concerning this lake which says that the spot occupied by the lake was once a thriving village, inhabited by a race of Carib Indians, but they offended the "great spirit" and the village disappeared, and next morning in its place was found the Pitch lake. Of course, this must be taken con grano salus.

In the lake during the day, may be seen large gangs of laborers digging the asphalt, which is carted by large mule carts to the shipping-places, and thence by vessel to European and American cities. The asphalt mixed with other substances is used for paving the streets of large cities. It is noiseless, healthy, and cleanly. E. dos Santos.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

Irreverent Remarks.

A Lesson in Morals.

From Life.

A Trustee of the Metropolitan Museum: "What are you doing here upon the Sabbath?"

Laboring Man: "I would like to see the interior of the museum."

Trustee (with much severity): "What! Upon the Sabbath? Come some week-day, blasphemous wretch!"

Laboring Man: "But I am hard at work other days to support my family, and unless I see it Sundays I shall never see it at all."

Trustee: "Then never see it at all. Better stay away than jeopardize your soul."

Laboring Man (surprised): "Jeopardize my soul! Why, I had heard these museums had an elevating influence."

Trustee: "Yes, but not on Sundays."

Laboring Man: "That's very curious! Why do you think so?"

Trustee: "Because it is wicked."

Laboring Man: "Wicked! I can't believe it."

Chorus of About Fifty Million Americans: "Nor we, either."

Trustee: "What, defiance? Away, impious brutes! Away, blasphemers!"

[He retires to his own house, which is filled with beautiful works of art, and there tries to realize the enormity of their sin.]

THE Rev. T. De Witt Talmage rests his principal claim to greatness on the sweet oratory which is his most potent weapon in devil-fighting. Possessing a smooth, gentle, and insinuating voice, he adds to it a courtliness of gesture and a dignity of demeanor outrivaling even the famous orators of old. People of commercial instincts hav suggested that Mr. Talmage might hav reached a greater degree of eminence had he become an auctioneer instead of a minister, but when one considers the revenue he receives from the syndicating of his sermons before they are preached, one must admit that his is not such a bad job after all. It has often been questioned which Mr. Talmage hated worse—newspaper men or the devil. Some of his sermons hav been quite as bitter against the former as the latter. But the newspaper men could talk back better than the gentleman whose office is located in the lower regions, and the net result of the sermons was the securing to Mr. Talmage of an amount of advertising from which his quiet, retiring nature must hav shrunk with the utmost aversion. Mr. Talmage has always been of opinion that St. Paul's sermon at the Acropolis did not do justice to the place, so, after a lapse of some eighteen hundred years, he has gone over and righted matters by preaching one of his own sermons from the same spot occupied by St. Paul. The Christian world will now breathe easier. Mr. Talmage might best be described as a simple, devout Christian, and in his lexicon there are no such words as bigot, fanatic, or mountebank.—Life.

BUSINESS PRINCIPLES.

She: "He is a brilliant preacher, but rather too worldly, I think. The man who works for the Lord expects to get paid as well as the rest of you."

He: "Yes, and he doesn't wait till he gets to the next world to collect it, either."—Life.

CONSTRUCTIVE FREETHOUGHT IN THE Kingdom of the Unselfish.
BY JOHN LORD PECK.

The readers of this paper can find some genuine Constructive Freethought, which, in the words of one of their own writers, "reaches forward to grasp some philosophy of life and its myriad uses—some teaching that shall crystallize around this present life and lift it to a pedestal hitherto unknown—some lofty purpose that shall fill and thrill all with a new and glorious enthusiasm." This is what the book really accomplishes. To obtain it inclose price, $1.50, to the EMPIRE BOOK BUREAU, 28 Lafayette Pl., New York.

Gems of Thought.

THE cause of knowledge, in a more enlarged sense, the cause of general knowledge and of popular education, had no warmer friends, nor more powerful advocates, than Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson. On this foundation, they knew, the whole republican system rested; and this great and all-important truth they strove to impress by all the means in their power. Mr. Adams expresses the strong and just sentiment, that the education of the poor is more important, even to the rich themselvs, than all their own riches. On this great truth, indeed, is founded that unrivaled, that invaluable political and moral institution, our own blessing, and the glory of our fathers—the New England system of free schools.—Daniel Webster.

WE are getting more real solid sense. The school-house is the finest building in the village. We are writing and reading more books; we are painting and buying more pictures; we are struggling more and more to get at the philosophy of life, of things.—Ingersoll.

THE ruinous consequences of standing armies to free communities may be seen in the histories of Syracuse, Rome, and many other once flourishing states; some of which hav now scarce a name! Soldiers are taught to consider arms as the only arbiters by which every dispute is to be decided between contending states; they are instructed implicitly to obey their commanders, without inquiring into the justice of the cause they are engaged to support; hence it is, that they are ever to be dreaded as the ready engins of tyranny and oppression.—Joseph Warren.

EVERY war terminates with an addition of taxes, and consequently with an addition of revenue; and in any event of war, in the manner they are now commenced and concluded, the power and interest of governments are increased. War, therefore, from its productivness, as it easily furnishes the pretense of necessity for taxes and appointments to places and offices, becomes the principal part of the system of old governments; and to establish any mode to abolish war, however advantageous it might be to nations, would be to take from such government the most lucrativ of its branches. The frivolous matters upon which war is made, show the disposition and avidity of governments to uphold the system of war, and betray the motivs upon which they act.—Paine.

CONDITION of Europe under the religious rule of the Middle Ages: A general eclipse of common sense and science. A wide-spread epidemic of anti-naturalism, miracle-worship, and self-torture. Rapid decline of industry. The neglect of rational agriculture turning thousands of fertil fields into deserts. Systematic suppression of political, personal, and intellectual liberty. Religious terrorism, culminating in man hunts and wholesale massacres. General ignorance, brutal abasement of the lower classes. Squalid misery of domestic life, general indifference to the beauties of nature and the blessings of health. A thousand years' interregnum of science, faith usurping the throne of reason, every branch of human knowledge withered by the poison of supernaturalism, literary activity limited to the production of homilies and miracle-legends, education devoted to the suppression of natural instincts and the substitution of submissiv belief for the love of truth and free inquiry. Decadence of the fine arts, natural science merged in a deluge of superstition. Summary: Darkness, misery, and slavery.—Prof. Oswald in The Secret of the East.

AT that period of human society [before 1789], what was the people? It was ignorance. What was religion? It was intolerance. And what was justice? It was injustice.—Victor Hugo.

CHRISTIANITY has dreamed a sad dream and does not welcome the morning with joy. The mother tells her falsehoods to her child, but, thank heaven, the child does not grow up in its parent's shadow.—Thoreau.

I BELIEVE that every good father and good mother wants to see the son and the daughter climb higher upon the great and splendid mount of thought than they reached.—Ingersoll.

MARRIAGE AS A "SACRAMENT."

Notes and Clippings.

THAT polyphonous old polysyllabist, Josephus Cook, exclaims the Sun, discussed the following topics during his talk jamboree in Boston yesterday: "Minority Rule in Congress; Remnants of Rebellion in Washington; Ballot Reform; State and National Reform in Congressional Proceedings; the Pan-American Congress." Josephus can pump more wind into his organ of speech than any other living man. It is curious to think how many cases of deafness would not hav occurred if he had been born dumb.

THE Telephone, England, says: Probably the most dangerous trust is the Lord trust, in which the Lord is trusted to do certain things that the trusters are too lazy and shiftless to do for themselvs. You may trust to your banker to take care of a promissory note for you when it becomes due, if you first deposit a sufficient sum to meet it; and, by the same token, you can trust to the Lord to bless you in your undertakings, if you put up the collaterals, Industry, Energy, and Faithful Application. If anyone claims that this doctrin is not taught in the Bible, we can answer, like the backwoods preacher, "It ought to be."

THE bill of the Quebec legislature to grant one hundred acres of land to farmers having twelve living children is creating considerable comment throughout the province, and every one is figuring in the glorious expectation of claiming the rich prize offered and bonus given for productivness. Louis XIV. (Louis the Great) offered a premium on families of ten and twelve children, and, following his good example, Premier Mercier proposed the measure, which was adopted by the Quebec legislature. The effect upon the community, the government contend, will be not only to encourage domestic habits, but to engender and cement a feeling of paternal regard between the two noble races of which the population is composed.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its usual sagacious enterprise, has published in its columns a Symposium upon Freethought. The questions submitted for answers are the following: "Is there an Affirmativ, Positiv, Constructiv side to Freethought? If not, the reason why? If there be, in what, in your opinion, does it consist, and in what should it consist?" Most of the prominent writers in the Freethought ranks hav replied to the queries; and, so far as we hav seen, they all agree that Freethought has an "Affirmativ, Positiv, and Constructiv side." As it should be, Colonel Ingersoll leads off in the Symposium. We are glad to announce that the whole of the papers will shortly be published in pamphlet form at a low price, and thus our readers will be able to peruse the various speeches in their entirety.—Secular Thought.

DR. DE WITT TALMAGE, says Truth, is probably one of the most audacious humbugs in the orthodox pulpit. Here he has been on a flying visit to Jerusalem, said to be in the interest of a publishing house that desires him to write a life of Christ. While in that historic city he went up a hill that he supposed to be Calvary, and thinking it would be a good speculation tried to buy it, but there being a Moslem burying-ground there it could not be purchased. He then, to use his own words, rolled a reddish stone down the hill, had it loaded on the back of a camel, and brought it home to be the corner-stone of his new temple. To the ordinary scholar this must all be very side-splitting, for the ordinary scholar knows that the traditional Calvary is covered by a church and is within the walls of the present city, and Dr. Talmage would hardly attempt to buy the Church of the Holy Sepulcher. And this is the man who is going to write a life of Christ and took a dash at the wrong sites before doing it. If he had only employed the common research of a conscientious preacher and consulted Schaff or Strong or any of the multitudinous books on Jerusalem which ought to be in his own library, he would not hav made this mistake.

AT the dinner of the Legal Protectiv Association of Cigar Manufacturers at Delmonico's on the evening of the 20th, David Hirsh, in speaking for "The Cigar Industry," referred to Colonel Ingersoll as a divine who had dignified the gathering with his presence. Colonel Ingersoll kissed his hand in recognition of the cheers with which this compliment to him was greeted. General Woodford referred to his near neighbor as the Rev. Robert G Ingersoll, and remarked that time had hung both their scalps to his girdle. Colonel Ingersoll spoke for "Tobacco." "As to baldness being a sign of age," he said, "the youngest persons I ever saw were bald. Now as to my toast, I am called upon to speak for the divine plant called tobacco. I hav loved it all my life—that is, since I was ten years old, and I liked the first chew of old plug I put into my mouth as well as I do now. There's too much hypocrisy about the use of tobacco; thousands use it and lie about it. I want you to use it and defend its use, because it adds something to the value and happiness of life. In spite of the thunders of the pulpit and the anathemas of physicians, its use is increasing, and this is because the brain of man craves it. What would we do without it? Think of waiting for a train without tobacco! Think of crouching in the deadly rifle-pit without tobacco! What would those do who add value to life by spanning the world with the rainbows of fancy without tobacco? All use tobacco and are the better for it. Hav the courage of your happiness and defend its use. Tobacco is a luxury, and on that account I want the tax on it removed. No matter what necessaries cost, I want cheap luxuries. They say luxuries should be taxed because the rich pay for them. Why, labor pays all the taxes in the world! It is the only solvent thing beneath the stars. The diamonds which glisten on the bosom of beauty are paid for by labor. I want tobacco absolutely free in these United States. Some want poor devils to do all the work in this world and smoke in the next. I want them to smoke in this. The fumes which arose from the pipe of peace of the Indian were as different from the clouds of war as heaven and hell—are there any such places? Tobacco is the best plant that grows on the face of the earth. Personally, I would rather do without any other vegetable. I pity the ancients, who had to do without it, and I envy Columbus, who was the first European to see its smoke rise over the fair isle of Cuba. This new world has given no better gift to mankind than the celestial leaf. Gentlemen, giv us straight goods, and future generations will rise up and call you blessed."

Communications.

The Church and the Stage.

To large-minded persons, it may seem a work of supererogation to gravely consider in this advanced age of the world's progress, the question of the utility of the stage as a factor in the education of the people, and I readily acknowledge that in again exposing the fallacies and absurdities in the arguments urged against such amusements as are afforded at the theater I am doing something very much in the nature of "slaying a dead horse."

But when my opponents insist not only that the defunct creature is still alive, but in "splendid condition," it is necessary to show that the pole-ax of reason did actually perform its work effectually in the past and that the same weapon is fit for similar execution to-day.

THE STAGE A POWERFUL RIVAL.

The truth is, the stage has won a position in the world of art which the combined attacks of the clergy and pious laymen, however assiduously pursued, will fail to destroy.

No doubt the clergy feel that the stage is a very powerful rival to the church; and the clergy hate nothing so much as competition.

Persons who regularly patronize theaters, moreover, even if they be of a religious turn of mind, get weaned from attendance at church in time—at all events, from the Protestant church.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IS MORE ARTISTIC

Its service, with its imposing procession of priests carrying incense, the great candles burning in the oratory, its grand mass given by professional vocalists with orchestral accompaniment—is at once more dramatic and impressiv than that of the Church of England.

Hence we very rarely hear of a Catholic priest inveighing against the theater.

Indeed, in his case the retort would be too obvious.

Many Christians appear to forget that in medieval times the church was artistic, and passion plays were given in connection with it—plays in which Jesus Christ was hero, the Virgin Mary heroin, and Judas Iscariot the heavy villain. Whether comedy scenes were sandwiched between the more serious ones, I am unable to say, but certain it is that many intricate plots were built out of very scanty, undramatic though perfectly scriptural materials. Even in the reign of Henry II. "holy plays" were given regularly to set forth miracles. Nor is this all. All the best tunes of the church were taken from operatic sources. In fact, for ages

ALL ART WAS IN THE KEEPING OF THE CHURCH.

The great sculptor, the great artist, the great musician—each found he could liv only by working in connection with the popular faith.

When, therefore, Christians insist that art was sustained and nurtured by the church, it is enough to reply that the church at this time had all the wealth, all the learning, all the power, all the influence—and artists had no option but to work for the church or perish.

It is also true that too many great artists were profoundly imbued with the spirit of religion—they were sincerely in earnest about it; and this in addition to their earnestness, enthusiasm, and love for their art contributed toward the creation of those magnificent works of art which are a living monument to the genius of many of the great dead.

A time came, however, when the church lost its power with the intelligent portion of the community, and with it came a gradual decadence of art. Indeed, when the puritanical spirit had got a strong hold of the people, art, science, and literature were temporarily banished—and a strong repugnance was manifested by the clergy toward all kinds of amusements.

Religion alone was sacred—all art was treated as profane, and the church vigorously denounced persons who attended theaters and other places of public amusement as wicked and corrupt beings who were hurrying rapidly down the "broad path that leadeth to destruction." With the accession of Puritanism came a period of unspeakable gloom.

HE WHO LAUGHED WAS A BLASPHEMER.

And he who endeavored to make life in this world pleasant and comfortable deserved nothing short of everlasting punishment in hell fire.

Some Christians who are favorable to the stage to-day urge that the theater has very much improved since these ancient puritanical days, and so also, we may reply, has the Church. Many of the old and barbarous doctrine hav been considerably modified, even where they av not been abandoned altogether. But still some of the old school of the Christians survive and hav recently revived the "theater" controversy in England again.

A Wesleyan minister named the Rev. Frank Ballard a short time ago wrote an inoffensiv pamphlet on "Modern Church Amusements: Are They Scriptural or Devilish?" in which he contended that rational amusement was necessary and beneficial to mankind and was not opposed to the spirit of Christianity, whereupon a number of Christian divines, dissenters of the Church of England, swooped down upon poor Ballard with a view of showing him, first, that he was no Christian, and second, that if he was, he knew nothing of holy writ. Upon the first point I express no opinion, but on the second I am inclined to think that the orthodox clergy hav the best of the argument.

Scriptural texts in favor of amusements of any sort we may seek for in vain.

Christians are adjured to think not of the things of this world, but of the glory of the next.

"Beware," says the New Testament, "lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ" (Col. ii, 8). And Christians are further warned: "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we hav preached unto you let him be accursed" (Gal. i, 8, 9). Of course if this world is "a vale of tears" to be borne with lowliness of spirit and submission, anything that is calculated to make one forget the sorrow and pain of life may from a Christian point of view be regarded as a sin. And this is the view taken by one of the Christian opponents of Mr. Ballard, who sums up that gentleman's philosophy in the following way: "Let us eat, drink, and be merry, while life lasts; for or, if there is, God is too good to send any of his creatures there except for a short time; and if you do fail here you will hav a better chance hereafter, and are sure to get to heaven at last no matter how you liv on earth."

THERE IS NO HELL;

I quite admit that if there be a hell no man with a heart to feel for his fellows could be quite happy if he thought that any of them by attending a theater was increasing his chances, if not making it a certainty, that he would go there.

As a Freethinker, I hav no belief in a hell; I hav, however, a strong belief in the healthful and educational value of the theater. But let us see by this anonymous parson against the promoters and patronizers of public amusements.

WHAT ARE THE CHARGES BROUGHT

Here are his words, let us set them out and examin them. First, what are the results, not of innocent, but of "devilish amusement," as it is promoted by the churches and Sunday-schools, and which Mr. Ballard, the Wesleyan minister, seeks to justify? We answer, When the population of Liverpool was 400,000 the Sabbath morning's attendance on public worship was about 100,000. Twenty-eight years later, when the population had increased 600,000, with an increase of churches, chapels, and Sunday-schools and ministers, etc., "the devil's mission of amusement and the new theology," had become so popular that Archdeacon Farrar could proclaim at the church congress in Manchester,

"HELL HAS BEEN BANISHED

from nearly every pulpit in England," the Sunday morning attendance on public worship was found to be 60,000, or 40,000 less out of 600 000 than when the population was only 400,000, and foolish amusements were not allowed, and ministers were in the regular habit of preaching, to use the words of Mr. Ballard, in terms that gathered blackness like a hailstone passing down a chimney, "as their predecessors had done for the last three hundred years."

A falling off of the Sunday morning attendance at church in Liverpool is due then, according to this divine, to the Saturday night rush to the theaters. This explanation has, at least, the merit of novelty. The probability is, however, that the decrease is due to an altogether different cause. It may be that the common sense of the people has enabled them to discover that the clergy hav nothing to teach. In that case the church suffers from having

BEEN FOUND OUT.

The people seem to hav had enough of the "foolish amusements" provided by orthodox entertainers. They hav done with cant; and in future prefer to take their pleasure in amusements that please, instead of at a sort of entertaining penance.

It is consequently an agreeable fact to find that there is a considerable falling off in church attendance, and it would be still more gratifying to learn that those who hav ceased to attend church hav found some other place where entertainment and instruction are imparted of a higher and more beneficial character.

The second charge of this anonymous parson is, that "actors and actresses never hav been and never can be regarded as a respectable class of society."

It is perfectly true that, in the past, the actor found some difficulty alike in taking his proper position in society and in the world of art. But this was largely due to a religious prejudice against his "calling." An actor was a sort of outcast. Religious folk regarded him as bad—because he made people forget the supposed horrors in store for them in the next world.

But to-day

THE ACTOR IS WELCOMED IN THE BEST OF SOCIETY.

Statesmen, poets, novelists, barristers, seek his company; princes and kings "command" him to visit their palaces and entertain them.

The anonymous divine goes further and affirms that "theaters are such schools of profanity, immorality, and irreligion that every neighborhood where a theater stands is infected as with a moral leprosy. The generality of those who attend theaters are rakes, gamblers, drunkards, fast men and loose women."

Profane and irreligious the people who attend theaters may be, but their morality is probably equal, if not superior, to that of many who attend church.

This parson admits that out of 649 prisoners in a certain jail 593 had been Sunday-school scholars; and I hav no doubt that a study of the statistics would show that a majority of criminals in this country are not drawn from the irreligious theater-goers, but from the ranks "who profess and call themselvs Christians," and who occasionally, if not regularly, attend either church or chapel. A study of history further demonstrates that prostitutes in all countries are believers in religion; and though it may be true that they sometimes ply their abominable trade outside theaters, it is equally true that they do the same thing outside churches and chapels in all large cities.

At length, however, the learned divine reaches his great point, and that is this, that stage plays are in themselvs bad, and therefore even the pure-minded and the cultured hav nothing to learn from witnessing a performance of them. With Cowper he affirms:

> From first to last it was an evil place,
> For such things are acted there as make
> The devils blush, and from their neighborhood
> Angels and holy men trembling retire.

The anonymous divine does not discriminate. He condemns all plays alike at one stroke.

Shakspere, Beaumont and Fletcher, Addison, Sheridan, Oliver Goldsmith, Sheridan Knowles, W. G. Wills, Palgrave Simpson, H. J. Byron, James Alberry, Tom Taylor, Henry Arthur Jones, Robert Buchanan, Henry Petitt, and George R. Sims, all estimated at the same value and their works unceremoniously pronounced worthless. But let us briefly consider and see how far it fulfills its purpose. What, then, is the function of the stage—the ultimate object of the play?

Ruskin says, "All good art is didactic in its essence," and this is as true of the histrionic as of any other art. Shakspere defines the object of the drama to be to "hold up, as it were the mirror to nature; to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time, his form and pressure."

But do the plays of our day properly fulfill their function?

In my judgment they do. Of course it is no good to present the highest form of art to the poor, uncultured work-people who flock to the theaters from the poorer neighborhoods of the metropolis, or in the provinces. They would not understand it and it would hav few charms for them. As well try to teach them mathematics before they understand the elementary rules of arithmetic; as well endeavor to make them appreciate the best music before they hav had the slightest training in melody, as expect them to understand and appreciate true acting or great plays until they hav received the necessary instruction to fit them to understand them. But the church is responsible for a good deal of this lack of appreciation. The clergy hav libeled the actor's calling, denied its utility, and the people hav received no encouragement to patronize and support the art—and in the past until the education act of 1870 their education was entirely neglected.

Despite all this the drama, during the last quarter of a century, has greatly improved, and classical plays hav been represented at West End theaters with unparalleled success. "Hamlet," with Mr. Henry Irving as the prince, had a phenomenal run of three hundred nights at the Lyceum, and this was followed by "The Merchant of Venice," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Macbeth," and other plays of the highest order, all of which were duly appreciated by the educated classes. During the last quarter of a century, too, the theater-going public hav been able to witness such distinguished tragedians as Salvini, Phelps, Creswick, Edwin Booth, Charles Dillon, Barry Sullivan, and Henry Irving; such honorable artistes as Ellen Terry, Mary Anderson, Mrs. Hermann Vezin, and such capital comedians as David James, J. T. Toole, Chas. Wyndham, Lionel Brough, Beerholm Tree, Mat Robson, Edward Terry, etc., and a number of excellent actors of second rank hav appeared at minor theaters for the edification and amusement of the populace.

On the whole the plays presented, at all events in London, hav been of educational and moral value. Who that saw the late John Clayton as Hugh Trevor in "All for Her," could doubt that the stage may be the medium of imparting the highest moral teaching? Did not Tom Taylor impart a noble lesson in his admirable play of "The Ticket of Leave Man?" or Charles Reade in "Never too Late to Mend?"

Were Henry Arthur Jones and Henry Hermann pandering to a low or depraved taste when they wrote "The Silver King?"

That some plays hav been produced of an inferior order will be granted at once, but even in these the praises of virtue hav been sung and vice vigorously condemned. But if the doctrin of the clergy be true and human beings are all "inherently depraved," it is a singular thing that even the "gods" at a transpontin theater hiss and howl at the villain, and vociferously cheer when the virtuous hero frustrates the evil designs of his enemy.

If man were really "inherently depraved," he would glory in the triumph of villainy. He would applaud honest Iago as he plunges his sword into the stomach of his friend Roderigo while pretending to regret his injuries; he would chuckle with delight when Jem Dalton opens the safe in Mr. Gibson's office and steals the bank notes; he would go into ecstasies of malignant joy over the misdeeds of Sweeney Tood, the barber of Fleet street. When, therefore, we notice that this does not occur, but that manifestations of an opposit character are displayed, I think we hav the very best possible evidence that the clerical declaration about the depravity of human beings is nothing short of a false and wicked libel, with no foundation in fact.

Naturally, if art is to progress, the people must hav some sympathy with artists who endeavor to faithfully portray character; who conscientiously strive to giv the world their best work. To sneer at art is not to improve it; to condemn it without understanding its aim is culpable folly. All art is an improvement upon nature's spontaneous course of action. Nature gives us marble, but the sculptor's trained hand imparts to it form and beauty. Nature does not paint, but the artist delineates upon canvas scenes and living forms that hav impressed him, while the actor givs life and movement to the creation of the dramatist.

As Miss Ella Dietz, herself an admirable actress, beautifully said in addressing the Church Guild's Union, January, 1886: "The province of dramatic art is specially to reveal the human soul in action. The dramatist and actor is a psychologist, as the painter and sculptor is a physiologist. The painter's province is to reveal the different types of physical temperament, but the actor goes deeper and shows the mental and psychical nature of mankind. If he be true to his art, he will not only show you the action, but the motiv behind the action. The subtle workings of man's heart and brain are all laid bare by the actor's art."

Now, I ask you, is this art one to despise? Is this a calling to be looked down upon? The actor who is really gifted with genius for his calling has received from his creator one of the highest gifts that a human being can receive. I believe that he should be held responsible for the use he makes of that gift. Instead of saying, as many churchmen do, "Your calling is in itself degrading and you cannot serve God in it," I would hav the church say to every actor, "Your calling is in the highest degree honorable and you must serve God in it, not only for your own sake, but for the sake of the multitudes which you may influence by your art." I hav made a life-long study of this subject, and I say to you in all soberness and earnestness that it is not only desirable, but necessary that dramatic art should be placed in an honorable position among its sister arts, and that all who follow it should be taught to reverence it as it deserves to be reverenced and to follow it with loyal devotion and earnestness. If it has not been heretofore so followed by a majority of its professors I charge for having indirectly, if not directly, denied the sacredness of the calling, and for having failed to encourage and uphold the young who seek to fit themselvs for the practice of this art.

Unless we realize that truthful art is as much a necessity to the healthy development of our souls as wholesome food is to the growth of our bodies, we cannot possibly rate the work of the artist at its true value. We must first get a clear conception of the relativ place that an art occupies in an ideally pure state before we can giv the followers of that art their just position as artists or praise or condemn them according as they reach or fall below an acknowledged standard of excellence."

The function of the drama is to amuse, but it is also to teach. And the morality of the stage will invariably be found to be a faithful reflex of the ethical teachings of the community in which it is found. The moral view of the dramatist must always be slightly above that of the audience for which he writes. But if his art be corrupt rest assured the morals of his audience are corrupt also. My contention is that dramatic art was never in a healthier condition. That is to say, it appeals to all classes by its amusing and instructiv qualities, it appeals to old and young, rich and poor. It provides change of scene, it makes the poor forget their hardships, the struggles and misery of their lives—in short, it transports them for the time being into an ideal world, givs them something to dream about—a higher state of existence, a heaven that may be realized here on earth. An art that can do this is surely not to be despised, but rather to be encouraged and supported. For, simultaneously with the growth of such an institution as the stage and the development of all that is noblest and best in the actor's art, we shall also see an improvement in the physical and intellectual natures of all who are brought under its influence. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

The Atonement Doctrin Encourages Crime.

I hav been waiting to see if either the radical, or religious press, would take any notice of the remarkable sermon delivered in New York on Sunday, the 12th of January, by the Rev. Dr. Peters, on "Defaulters, and How They Are Made." But as I hav waited in vain, I herewith send you the Herald's notice of it, which appeared in the columns of that paper the next day, and subjoin a few remarks:

The Bloomingdale Reformed church, at Sixty-eighth street and the Boulevard, was filled with fashionable people yesterday morning. The sermon was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Madison Peters and entitled, "Defaulters and How They Are Made."

Dr. Peters referred to statistics, and stated that during 1889 in the United States the grand total of money embezzled from the government, private firms, and corporations by dishonest officials and employees amounted to nearly $8,600,000. "But when one remembers," said he, "that our aggregate wealth is $60,000,000,000 and our coin and currency in circulation amounts to $1,000,000,000, and railroad bonds represent $9,000,000,000, it can hardly be called surprising that out of sixty-four million people enough dishonest men can be found to steal $8,600,000. These figures alone prove that the great mass of men are honest.

"Defaulters are made partly by the ignorance and unbounded credulity of the public in the matter of making investments. They are also made by careless and unbusinesslike methods and penuriousness of employers. It is an established fact that defaulting clerks hav invested thousands of dollars, manifestly not their own, in stockbrokers' offices. There is but one way to stop this. Make every broker responsible for all losses if he negotiates with irresponsible persons, and hav the ministers of the gospel take a more practical view of the matter. The preaching in our time should be stronger and more practical on these subjects, for a majority of the defaulters hav been prominent church-members. Then you will see a decrease in the records of defaulters."

Thus it appears that, during the last year, consisting of only three hundred and sixty-five days, no less than $8,600,000 were stolen in this country, and that "a majority of the defaulters hav been prominent church-members." Had this statement been made in THE TRUTH SEEKER, or any other Secular paper, the church people would hav pronounced it to be a malicious, Infidel slander. But, as it was uttered in the pulpit of an orthodox church, before a respectable congregation, by a distinguished clergyman of undoubted veracity, who had carefully examined the subject, his statement compels belief.

It is a pity that Dr. Peters, when he was about it, did not giv the names, as well as the numbers, of these defaulters, and the amounts respectivly taken, so that the public might know exactly what proportion of them were religious robbers, and what proportion were unregenerated sinners and Infidels.

After informing his congregation how defaulters are made, the reverend doctor proceeds to show how defalcations can be stopped, but it is very remarkable that, in prescribing his remedy for the curvature of the spine which prevents so many saints from walking perpendicularly in life, he makes no mention of the "all-sufficient grace of God" having the force of even a strengthening plaster, much less a panacea.

The Calvinistic clergy of New York, in discussing the proposal to eviscerate the Westminster Confession of Faith, without destroying its life, hav proved themselvs to be a sorry lot of logicians, whose incompetency would disgrace a college sophomore. I could not submit a question, either in theology or morals, to them as a jury, but if we had an open court of investigation, where the court and jury were sitting to ascertain only the truth in a given case, I would like to examin before them, and show cause to believe, that the prominent church-members in good and regular standing, who stole their share of the $8,600,000 last year, did so because of the secret influence which religion exercised in forming their character. Naturally good men are honest in the affairs of life, whether they belong to the church or not. But in the case of the common run of men, who are the scrubs of humanity, religion is sure to convert them into rogues and hypocrits upon the least temptation. Take one of these brethren who has confessed Christ before the world on the promis that if he does so, Christ will confess him before God and the angels in the day of judgment. Tell him that, without any reference to his good works, which, at their best, are, in the estimate of God, nothing but the filthy rags of his own self-righteousness, he was predestinated to everlasting life; that by virtue of the eternal decree, Christ came into the world to make the necessary atonement for his sins, original, actual, past, present, and to come; and that his salvation is as sure as that of the brightest archangel who stands before the throne of God; let his character be molded and permeated with these pleasurable convictions; and he secretly feels that he is not answerable to human laws for his conduct. For, who will dare to lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God who has justified him, and he stands as one who never sinned. Who is he that is presumptuous enough to condemn him? It is Christ that died to atone for every sin he would commit. God is just, and would never demand double satisfaction for the same offense.

If a person will read the New Testament, and especially the epistles of Paul, he will see that this doctrin of election, and all the rest which grow out of, and dovetail with it, are, in the Christian system, what the spinal column, and the whole network of the nervous system, are to an animal; and I submit that, in the very nature of the case, the tendency of a man's belief in such doctrins, as applied to himself, is to make his morals bad, instead of good. How can we otherwise account for the fact that the penitentiaries, in all the states, hav within their walls so many criminal Christians? When we remember that God is said to hav pledged his word to keep the saints through his almighty power by faith unto salvation; that their names were written in the book of life eternal where there are no blots, and no erasures, and only transferred beforehand to the rolls of the church on earth, so that they might be known as shining lights in a world darkened by sin; and act like salt in preserving society from moral corruption; and to that end underwent a careful examination, one by one, by the divinely appointed and commissioned shepherds of the Lord's sheep; I say, when we remember all this, we are compelled to suppose, in the case of the thousands of saints now imprisoned in the penitentiaries as convicted criminals, either that the prosecuting attorneys, judges, witnesses, and juries, who brought about their conviction, were predestinated reprobates and persecutors of the innocent children of God, or that the Lord's shepherds, notwithstanding the influence of the Holy Ghost, enlightening and aiding them in their sacred work, were so blind and stupid that they could not tell the difference between a sheep and a goat.

It might be urged against what I hav said that the self-righteousness and presumption which Calvinism naturally breeds into a man's character is absent in the character of the Arminian, who rejects Calvinism with as much scorn as the Infidel does, and that it might be expected there would be fewer Arminian saints in the penitentiaries than any other kind. But in the hot-bed of the church, where the religious bias grew, the arrogance and presumption of the Arminian are bred into him by the doctrin of salvation by repentance at the eleventh hour and fifty-ninth minute of his life; or that, "While the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return." In its influence on the formation of character this dogma is as powerful for evil as the dogma of predestination to eternal life without reference to good works. The Catholic creed is Arminian, and see the potency the priests ascribe to it in the rites of the church at the execution of criminals. All these life-long transgressors and red-handed murderers who are not fit for human society on earth, are transformed by the hocus-pocus of the priest, at the last moment, into saints, and may be found the morning after the rope is taken off their necks stepping along the streets of the New Jerusalem receiving the congratulations of all the rest of the redeemed brotherhood. It requires a little more gumption in a Calvinist to know how to read his title clear to mansions in the skies, but any ignoramus can understand how a sinner, or a backsliding Christian, can shed the tears of repentance at the eleventh hour of his life, and go to heaven believing that Jesus has paid all his debts. Hence, it will be found, in examining the statistics of the penitentiaries, that the Catholic and the Methodist churches, whose creeds are rigidly Arminian, furnish more criminals than any of the others. And I attribute the fact to the license which the Arminian theology givs to the scrubs of humanity who compose so large a part of the membership of these churches, by teaching them that repentance, at the last gasp of life, will usher them into heaven. SENEX.

Destructiv, Constructiv, or Both?

Freethought is constructiv of all that is highest, noblest, and best. It is perpetually building up the new, the true, and the great. It reaches out for every progressiv help for humanity. It builds for happiness here and now, and also on, on, on as long as there is a single life left to enjoy and to love.

No one person negates more than another only as he has more brain power. Each one negates all that he believes wrong, false, harmful, and untrue. Every sect negates certain tenets of all other sects.

The Freethinker negates all that seems to him mythical, unscientific, and untrue, and does it by building up the right, the true, the good, and the beautiful.

Love and kindness are the basis of all the freedom, and consequently Freethought must be constructiv and upbuilding. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

The Prize Manual.

The offer of $1,000 for the best essay showing teachers "how to teach morality without teaching religious doctrin," has been before the public for nearly six months, it having been extensivly advertised in the public press. I hav been surprised to find how few hav expressed any difficulty in understanding the terms or conditions of the offer, and that fewer still hav expressed any difficulty in complying with the conditions. I hav been called upon by letters from individuals, for about one thousand of the circulars, and I hav good reason to believe that many minds of a high order are now struggling with the problem, in friendly competition for the prize. College professors from every section of the country, school superintendents, teachers, male and female, of every grade, and scores of literary men of all the professions, hav written on the subject, or are writing, not only in the United States, but in Canada and several European states. Manuscripts are already coming in, and I expect by the first of April to be flooded with papers, from all parts of the world. It is too late to criticise the terms and conditions of our offer, and to discuss the metaphysics of the problem. This would hav been in order last August or September. A very few persons gave the money, and they are so far well pleased with what has been done. I know there are difficulties in the questions to be treated, but we hav chosen to leave them with the various writers. It was said the best way to "resume specie payment was to, resume." We tried it—and did resume and had no trouble. We propose to show the world how to teach the purest principles of morality without teaching religious doctrin—and we expect to succeed. We will be ready to discuss the metaphysics of the question, when all our writers shall hav failed to comply with the terms of our offer.

Death of Capt. Joseph Sedgebeer,

VICE PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

Joseph Sedgebeer, of Painesville, O., passed away Jan. 29, 1890, in the ninetieth year of his age. His demise was immediately preceded by the departure of a beloved daughter and his loving wife. A man is best known to his children, and the following sketch is from a letter from them:

Father's life has been one of many trials and hardships. Born in the city of Bristol, Eng., in 1801, he, at the age of ten years, was left without any protection, his mother having left him and gone to America. He entered a merchant ship as cabin-boy, and followed the sea until he became a captain. A grand sense of duty, at this mature age, compelled him to giv up his seafaring and to search for his parent. In his search he reached the wilder portions of Canada and, necessity compelling him to protect himself, he at once commenced clearing land. For a few years he endured much suffering, but, accumulating a snug sum, he removed to the states, locating near Rochester, and becoming a successful business man. While there he found his mother, whom he protected and helped greatly until her death. Misfortune overtook him now, and he was left with comparativly nothing. Being of a most wonderfully determined disposition, he again entered business, and was more or less successful. He at last turned his inventiv powers into action and became the inventor of the Nonpareil Grist Mills and Cotton Seed Hullers, from which he derived a fine compensation. In later years his mind was greatly devoted to the study of truth.

His death was peaceful—his mind retaining its power until a short time before life had left. Not one word of complaint did he utter throughout his illness. As the body of his devoted wife was borne from his home to the last resting-place, his sons approached his bedside and asked if they should stay with him. Taking each by the hand, he said, in his determined way, "No, no! Do your duty and return to me." After returning from the cemetery he again took their hands and said, "You hav returned. It is all over," and soon his life had gone.

Captain Sedgebeer was one of the $100 contributors to the $1,000 fund for the Prize Manual, and gave freely and frequently of his money for the general work of the society. A good man and a prince has fallen. He was Liberal and devised Liberal things. We shall miss his cheering words, but shall not forget his good deeds. He was a consistent and bold Freethinker, held in high esteem by his friends and neighbors. His children, too, rise up and call him blessed. Peace to his ashes, and precious memories to his eventful life. He passed away calmly and in peace with all men.

A Voice from the West Indies.

Trinidad is a refuge for priests and for everything connected with priestcraft. I cannot but indorse fully the expressions used some years ago by one of the leading advocates of the bar here, who said, "Poor Trinidad, refugium pecatorum."

E siempre viene. Last month there arrived in this colony from New Orleans a dozen men to take charge of the Roman Catholic reformatory. The cloven hoof of priestcraft shows itself everywhere. It is a very observable fact, that can be seen by anyone willing to take the trouble, that on no account are men allowed to cross the threshold of nunneries or other places where nuns liv, but a proviso is always made to allow priests at any time they wish. This to me appears suspicious.

On the 14th of this month the Roman Catholic archbishop of Port-of-Spain was invested with his pallium. For the occasion there arrived two other bishops from the neighboring islands to assist in the ceremony. On such occasions one witnesses the pomp and pageantry of Rome in its full swing. The oath to the apostolic see was recited by the archbishop in Latin, and comprised the following promises: "To be faithful and obedient to the blessed apostle Peter, the holy Roman church, and the pope and his canonical successors. Not to be party in any way or under any circumstances to any hostil attempt against the life, liberty, or person of the pope. Not to reveal to his detriment any counsels confided to him by the pope personally, by his nuncio, or by letter. To assist him in retaining and defending against any man the papacy and patrimony of St. Peter. To treat with honor the legate of the apostolic see, both coming and going. To exert himself in preserving, defending, and increasing the rights, honors, privileges, and authority of the holy Roman church, of the pope and his successors. Not to take part in any machinations against the pope or the Roman church; to the best of his power to oppose such, and as early as possible to acquaint the pope with them. To observe, and cause to be observed by others, all the rules of the holy fathers, decrees, reservations, etc., of the apostolic see. To combat heresy, schism, and revolt against the pope. To attend synods unless hindered by a canonical impediment. To pay in person the ad limina visit every three years, and account to the sovereign pontiff for the state of his archdiocese. In turn to humbly receive and carry out the apostolic counsels. In case of legitimate obstacle to the visit to Rome, to depute some legate, ecclesiastical dignitary, or priest qualified for the purpose to replace him in that duty, and to properly assure of such obstacle the cardinal presiding over the congregation of sacred council. Not to alienate, or pledge, or subject to any incumbrance, without consulting the holy see, any church property. To be willing, in case of infraction, to incur all the penalties provided in the constitution of the episcopal office."

The pallium is a band of white lamb's wool worn on the shoulders. It has two strings of the same material and four purple crosses worked on it. Its origin is rather queer and full of hypocrisy. The following taken from an authority givs the origin of the pallium: "Two lambs are brought annually to the church of St. Agnes, at Rome, by the apostolic subdeacons while the Agnus Dei is being sung. These lambs are presented at the altar and received by two canons of the Lateran church. From this wool the pallia are made by the nuns of Torre de Specclio. The subdeacons lay the pallia on the tomb of St. Peter, where they remain all night."

This is a very superstitious origin. The oath to the apostolic see is direct treason, be that country a republic, a limited monarchy, or an absolute monarchy, where it is taken.

Trinidad presents a very heterogeneous mixture. In walking through the streets of the city, one can not help noticing the various races the population is composed of. As the races are various, so are their complexions variegated. The dresses of the females are variegated. The houses are variegated. Everything is variegated. A population capricious, amazing—a population of the Arabian Nights. A population of all hues—white, black, griffone, mêtisse, capresse, chabine, mulâtresse, messive, quadroon. A population of all kinds of breeds.

The East Indians, or coolies, as they are called here, form a very large and conspicuous part in the population, numbering as they do between sixty and seventy thousand. They are a mild and industrious race, not so robust as the African. They are very thrifty and intelligent, filthy in their habits, and it is not rare to find them living together, in crowded hovels, with their domestic animals. The East Indian women are below the average hight, and their dresses are made of cotton cloths of different colors. Some of the richer ones wear silk. Their arms are bare, and are covered from the wrists to the elbows with silver bracelets. Around their necks are necklaces made of English coins, and sometimes American ten and twenty dollar pieces. They also wear rings on their toes, and a favorit ornament of theirs is a gold ring passed through their nostrils.

The East Indians may be classed, religiously, as Hindoos, Mohammedans, and Christians. The Hindoos are in the majority, and they lay claim to very remote periods. Time with them is divided into four epochs—the Golden, Silver, Brazen, and Iron epochs, each one 432,000 years longer than the preceding one. Thus:

The Iron or present Yug, of which 5,000 years hav already passed, will be of duration	432,000
The Brazen Yug lasted	864,000
The Silver Yug lasted	1,296 000
The Golden Yug lasted	1,728,000
Total number of years	4,320,000

The Hindoos divide their holy writs or Shastras into eighteen parts, asserting that they contain as many different kinds of knowledge. The four Vedas form a part of this, and they consist of two principal parts:

1. The Muntras, a compilation of hymns and prayers, written in poetry, between 1,500 and 1,000 years before the Christian era.

2. The Brahmana, a collection of doctrins and precepts, detailing an endless number of ceremonies to be performed by the priest, the ascetic, and the hermit at their religious services.

The four books of the Veda are: Rig, Yagush, Sama, and Atharisa Vedas. Hindooism is divided into four castes, which are:

1. Brahman. Nobles and priests.
2. Kshatrija. Principal families and military.
3. Vaiseija. Persons engaged in agriculture and commerce.
4. Sudra. Servants.

These castes are again subdivided into various grades according to the trades they follow. Intercourse between one caste and another is a deadly sin. The Brahman and the Kshatrija wear a sacred thread or cord over their shoulders to which is attached a bead obtained from the plant pulsi. The Sudra is on no account permitted to enter the temple. Buddhism is an offshot of Hindooism or Brahmanism.

I shall in my next conclude on the East Indians.

Another Note on the Symposium.

THE TRUTH SEEKER'S inquiry: "Is there an affirmativ, positiv, constructiv side to Freethought?" seems to embrace a variety of queries bearing upon the essentials which hav to do with the public welfare. Public evils abound in all shades and forms, supposed by the commonalty to be counter-met by statutory law, yet often left neglected. Besides, there are laws extant or sought to be promulgated, that would deny to the people their just natural rights and privileges, leading to the disunity of the social compact. Not the least of these are derived from the outgrowth of unfortunate errors calculated to divide society into warring factions under the forms and pretensions consecrated to some form of religion—pretending to be God's will.

Strangely, history informs that the inclinations of the race hav mainly been in the direction of religious and political error, tending to the persecution of opinions and things founded upon truth and public good. Error has ever been militant in these acts, while Truth, especially during the early age of Christianity and later on, stood forth individually to affirm its manhood, reckless that tortures and burning alive by Christian hands, directed by God's vicegerents on earth, would be his or her fate.

Protestantism, finally, after much persecution, obtained an organism, known now in widely varying titles and forms, each using its power, covetous of wealth, to secure to itself both religious and political supremacy. Fortunately to the race the world over, the paths of their ambition are not so easy of attainment, so largely peopled, and crowned with honor, as they were even a few years since. Blocks of reason will be found in their way, truth also.

Having briefly gone over the ground thought to be germane to the matters under consideration, I will LOW giv my views as to what is and what should be the future of our Freethought activities.

First it must be noted, as has been seen, that Liberalism has ever been compelled to plant and maintain its ground against every obstacle which could be placed in its way, furnished and thrust forward by combinations of clericalism and monarchy. Worse. On this ground, dedicated to liberty and Freethought upon a not remote time, at this very year and hour rational liberty is sought to be overshadowed if not to be wrested from the people—at the dictation of what? Of those citizens who would place us, the masses, under an old-time hierarchy, themselvs companioned with others—not Americans, yet eager for the victory.

Does not this case—there are many others of an objectionable kind—instruct, compel Liberalism to place itself, with arms, if necessary, in the front rank, for the suppression of all such plans and intentions, in a very affirmativ, positiv, etc., position? Could it do less and maintain its honor? Has it not found itself in a defensiv position the world over whenever and wherever clerical and monarchical power hav threatened its overthrow? Why then should it not storm the hights at the beat of its own drum where Liberalism is assailed? May it vote to sustain unworthy candidates for any grade of an electiv office, or one who may speak or act adversely as to rational liberty accorded to all classes? Honor and duty as to public affairs point but one way—to the subversion of evil arising from public misrule and calamity, and the utter suppression of falsities promulgated in the interest of craft, of sordid design, and the self-conceit of unnatural greatness and power which often attends upon one's elevation in religious and political station. The world is full of such displays.

The National Secular Union is a faultless, grand institution, capable of doing a vast amount of public good upon the bases limited by its rules; but would it not prove to be more effectiv if it were made the central power and direction of an entire similar body of state like organisms, to act as tributary to the central institution? The aggregated costs, by being scattered, would not be large severally or as a whole. The interchangeable effects would be excellent, a new spur at each meeting. The younger people of both sexes, wherever located, would soon be enlightened by attendance and hypocrisy would soon fly away. Freethought pamphlets should, in large quantities, assorted, be stored in every one of these places for distribution and exchange. THE TRUTH SEEKER works of all kinds, I observe, are excellent, and in the main quite cheap. Music, well played, could not fail to call in a large attendance.

I can only add that our Liberal lecturers are men and women of rare abilities, doing great good. Their interchange over the states would help the interest greatly. C. K. DEAN.

Photius Fisk.

I wish to pay a tribute to the memory of Photius Fisk, who died in Boston, Mass., Feb. 7, 1890, aged eighty-two.

When I take my pen to write of Photius Fisk, language utterly fails me. His history and life are public property, though not known to all. Of his virtues, neither, need I speak. His generosity has been felt and chronicled on both continents. To know of the needy and suffering was enough for this grand old man to stretch forth his hand for relief. In the summer of 1889 a friend of mine experienced a severe loss by fire. I sent him a paper containing an account of the disaster. He at once wrote for particulars, on which being furnished, he sent me a bright, new fifty-dollar bill in a registered letter as a gift to the unfortunate man.

We, who knew him best, can bear testimony to his unswerving loyalty to truth. Shall we ever see his like again, so modest, so unassuming, so mild, so irreproachable!

O that his benevolent, humane, and tender heart could be embalmed within each one of us. His benignant countenance beams down upon me from where, enshrined, rests the fine lithograph presented me by himself some two years since, now, alas, draped in the emblems of bereavement and sorrow.

The history of his life, I understand, is ready for publication, when thousands, who only know him by name, will hav the opportunity of reading in detail the biography of this remarkable man, scholar, philanthropist, and friend.

Farewell, brave old Photius! You battled for the right when few stood by you; and, sustained by principle, fought like the heroes of old against slavery, oppression, superstition, and every wrong ignorance, cruelty, and tyranny can devise, and came off victorious for humanity and the ultimate progress of the race. Requiescat in pace. ELLA E. New Mexico's Statehood.

The admission of territories recently to statehood excites surprise, with the inquiry, Why is New Mexico not entitled to the same advantages? To the intelligent reader, distant from this territory, the writer furnishes these facts as a valid reason why New Mexico should continue under territorial management.

The nativ population, being in the majority, and Roman Catholics, sixty-seven per cent being unable to read or write, better enables the Jesuit priests to control them in politics, as they do in educational as well as spiritual matters. These priests are antagonistic to secular schools. The supremacy in politics of the nativ element would result in the public schools being controled by these priests, whose sworn fidelity to support their church independent of state or government, would compel the white element to be ruled by Mexicans. The supreme ignorance of this nativ population will remain a dangerous factor in politics until immigration has increased in numbers and intelligence sufficiently to control the territorial machinery of government, until proof has been established that New Mexico is entitled to statehood.

As usual in politics, the Roman Catholics are Democrats, hence New Mexico is not a Republican territory. That party has ruled, as the records show, not wisely, but with corruption foul as foul can be. If there is any choice between Jesuit influence and Republican misrule, one is bad and the other rotten.

Freethought in Sweden.

That it is well-nigh impossible to state the difference between the terms blasphemy and irreligious scoffing, has received an additional proof. Four different courts and the king did decide that the expression, "The God of the Old Testament is a sinner," constituted blasphemy, and now does Göta Hoffrätt inform the world that it is only irreligious scoffing! Tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum!

A report contains the proceedings of the court in full; it is a remarkable document, and we do not see how the legal gentlemen could keep from laughing when they framed their judgment. To aggravate the situation, V. Lennstrand has addressed another letter to the king, while Utiliska Samfundet calls Sweden's Anthony Comstock's attention to several blasphemous works which are sold in the principal bookstores, and which contain expressions still more unholy than any made by Lennstrand. This latter movement must be very disagreeable to the clerical party. If the sale of those books is not prohibited, the public censor and thereby the party can be indicted; and if the sale is prohibited, then the press law is violated. According to Swedish law, a jury only can decide upon questions relating to the press.

The Improved Man.

From the World.

The Improved Man will be in favor of universal liberty—that is to say, he will be opposed to all kings and nobles, to all privileged classes. He will giv to all others the rights that he claims for himself. He will neither bow nor cringe, nor accept bowing and cringing from others. He will be neither master nor slave, neither prince nor peasant—simply man.

He will be the enemy of all caste, no matter whether its foundation be wealth, title, or power, and of him it will be said: "Blessed is that man who is afraid of no man and of whom no man is afraid."

The improved man will be in favor of universal education. He will believe it the duty of every person to shed all the light he can, to the end that no child may be reared in darkness. By education he will mean the gaining of useful knowledge, the development of the mind along the natural paths that lead to human happiness.

He will not waste his time in ascertaining the foolish theories of extinct peoples nor in studying the dead languages for the sake of understanding the theologies of ignorance and fear, but he will turn his attention to the affairs of life, and will do his utmost to see to it that every child has an opportunity to learn the demonstrated facts of science, the true history of the world, the great principles of right and wrong applicable to human conduct—the things necessary to the preservation of the individual and of the state, and such arts and industries as are essential to the preservation of all.

He will also endeavor to develop the mind in the direction of the beautiful—of the highest art—so that the palace in which the mind dwells may be enriched and rendered beautiful, to the end that these stones, called facts, may be changed into statues.

The improved man will believe only in the religion of this world. He will hav nothing to do with the miraculous and supernatural. He will find that there is no room in the universe for these things. He will know that happiness is the only good, and that everything that tends to the happiness of sentient beings is good, and that to do the thing—and no other—that adds to the happiness of man is to practice the highest possible religion. His motto will be: "Sufficient unto each world is the evil thereof." He will know that each man should be his own priest, and that the brain is the real cathedral. He will know that in the realm of mind there is no authority—that majorities in this mental world can settle nothing—that each soul is the sovereign of its own world, and that it cannot abdicate without degrading itself. He will not bow to numbers or force, neither to antiquity nor custom. He, standing under the flag of nature, under the blue and stars, will decide for himself. He will not endeavor by prayers and supplication, by fastings and genuflections, to change the mind of the "infinit" or alter the course of nature, neither will he employ others to do these things in his place. He will hav no confidence in the religion of idleness, and will giv no part of what he earns to support parson or priest, archbishop or pope. He will know that honest labor is the highest form of prayer. He will spend no time in ringing bells or swinging censers, or in chanting the litanies of barbarism, but he will appreciate all that is artistic—that is beautiful—that tends to refine and ennoble the human race. He will not liv a life of fear. He will stand in awe neither of man nor ghosts. He will enjoy not only the sunshine of life but will bear with fortitude the darkest days. He will hav no fear of death. About the grave there will be no terrors, and his life will end as serenely as the sun rises.

The Improved Man will be satisfied that the supernatural does not exist—that behind every fact, every thought and dream, is an efficient cause. He will know that every human action is a necessary product, and he will also know that men cannot be reformed by punishment, by degradation, or by revenge. He will regard those who violate the laws of nature and the laws of states as victims of conditions, of circumstances, and he will do what he can for the well-being of his fellow-men.

The Improved Man will not giv his life to the accumulation of wealth. He will find no happiness in exciting the envy of his neighbors. He will not care to liv in a palace, while others who are good, industrious, and kind are compelled to huddle in huts and dens. He will know that great wealth is a great burden, and that to accumulate beyond the actual needs of a reasonable human being is to increase not wealth, but responsibility and trouble.

The Improved Man will find his greatest joy in the happiness of others, and he will know that the home is the real temple. He will believe in the democracy of the fireside, and will reap his greatest reward in being loved by those whose lives he has enriched.

The Improved Man will be self-poised, independent, candid, and free. He will be a scientist. He will observe, investigate, experiment, and demonstrate. He will use his sense and his senses. He will keep his mind open as the day to the hints and suggestions of nature. He will always be a student, a learner, and a listener—a believer in intellectual hospitality. In the world of his brain there will be continuous summer, perpetual seed-time and harvest. Facts will be the foundation of his faith. In one hand he will carry the torch of truth, and with the other raise the fallen. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

At Last They Hav the Annual in San Francisco.

From Freethought.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is out at last. That is, it is out here—one copy. About the time the market is supplied, our order of two months ago may be delivered by the railroad company, which has had our Eastern books in charge for the past few eons of duration. But that is immaterial to the merits of the work, which is the best yet. The table of contents is as follows:

Calendar for 1890; Freethought in the United States, 1889; Faded Flowers, poem by J. E. Remsburg; The Inauguration of the Bruno Statue, T. B. Wakeman; Mostly Fools, W. Stewart Ross (Saladin); Record of the Spanish Inquisition; Dates of the Fabrication of Some Roman Catholic Dogmas; The Boler House Mystery, Nearly a Tragedy, with a Moral, Helen H. Gardener; The Middle Ages, illustrated—The Priest, The Supernatural World, The Reformation, Future Terrors—The Inventions of Science and the Inventions of Christianity, illustrated; Freethought Journals in the United States; In Search of a Spirit, E. M. Macdonald; Why I Left the Church, H. O. Pentecost.

Without making any comparisons, it may be said that two of these contributions are of especial merit and interest. Mr. Remsburg's poem, "Faded Flowers," is a classic. The title is not new; the rhythm is not faultless, but the sentiment appeals irresistibly to the heart of the reader. The other, "In Search of a Spirit," by E. M. Macdonald, is an account, very amusingly written, of the Editor's attempt to get proof of spirit communication, wherein it is shown that his failure to reach his object was due wholly to the mediums and not at all to the investigator or to his friend, Mr. Charles McArthur, who instigated the search.

THE spirit of intolerance was at first equally strong in the church of Rome and in the reformed churches, and its extinction both in Catholic and Protestant countries was due to the spirit of Rationalism. In both cases the clergy were the untiring enemies of this the noblest of all the conquests of civilization, and it was only by a long series of anti-ecclesiastical revolutions that the sword was at last wrung from their grasp.—Lecky.

Helen Gardener and a Catholic "Lord."

Helen Gardener recently lectured in Newark, N. J., on "The Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle." Her words stirred the pious of the city to an unwonted extent, and led to the following discussion between Miss Gardener, the editor of the Press-Register, and a Catholic "authority," who is, we understand, no less a person than Monsignor Doane:

From the Press-Register of February 6th.

Very few residents of Newark hav any idea of the number among them who profess Atheism and who hav even more advanced views upon social matters than the most pronounced Anarchist. These evils are not blatant and flamboyantly urged, as they were in the case of the Chicago unfortunates, but they are eating their way slowly and insidiously under the wing of so-called Liberal Leagues, Spiritualists, and other windy beliefs. With all due respect, the teachings of Hugh O. Pentecost hav added to the flames not a little. In his case, however, the hearers are of a higher mental caliber, and they are merely fascinated by his personal magnetism and amused by his mental acrobacy. His work has had no serious results, because he has repudiated vehemently one year what he vehemently advocated a year previous, and his search after truth has been a series of backdowns from his earlier Positivism. Like an unsteady but powerful engin he has switched off the track into the dark and deep ditch. He is still searching for solid ground.

The other agencies of "Reform" are more dangerous, however, because they are composed with but few exceptions of men and women whose vanity induces their belief that ignorance of history, and doubt of religious and sublime doctrins, are the principal necessities for the reform of society and betterment of man's earthly condition. Indirectly the following letter is interesting in this connection:

To the Editor of the Press-Register: On the 22d of last month the following editorial note appeared in your paper:

Helen Gardener, who lectured in Oraton Hall Tuesday night, said: "The Catholic church is the only one that has good sense. It doesn't allow its people to read the Bible." To be plain, Miss or Mrs. Gardener tells a clean-cut falsehood. That old charge against the Catholics has been refuted time and again. Its repetition nowadays is simply a display of ignorance.

On behalf of Miss Gardener and the lecture committee of the New Abolition club, I respectfully request you to publish the following explanation, furnished by our lecturer:

In calling Miss Gardener's statement regarding the Catholic church and the Bible "a clean-cut falsehood," she states: "I presume he would admit that a papal bull on any subject was a fairly plain indication of Catholic opinion. If it were against a thing, I fancy he would say that Catholics were not 'allowed' to do that thing—no matter how many Catholics took the liberty to disobey the 'bull.'"

Many Catholics had taken the liberty to read the Bible, and were growing restiv to such a degree that in the year of grace, 1817, Pius VII., on June 29, condemned the reading of the Bible by papal bull.

This is profane history. It is also church history, and until the church records of papal bulls are "expurgated" or "revised" again the "old charge" will continue to be made and its "refutation" won't do a great deal of good.

As your editorial note implies that Mrs. Gardener uttered "a clean-cut falsehood" and that the statement made by her was "simply a display of ignorance," I trust, in justice to her and our club, you will giv this the same publicity as your note. Thanking in anticipation,

On behalf of the lecture committee of the New Abolition club, THOMAS ROGERS.

Newark, Feb. 2d.

Without prejudice to either side, and recognizing the matter as one of history, the Press-Register sent a representativ to a leading Catholic authority in this city, and his reply to Miss Gardener's champion is as follows:

No bull relativ to the perusal of the sacred scriptures was promulgated by Pope Pius VII., nor was any new disciplinary law regarding the use of the Bible either by the laity or the clergy enacted by him. It is true that in 1816 that illustrious pontiff, who was so cruelly persecuted during his life and is now maligned after his death, issued two briefs referring to the circulation in Poland of certain vernacular versions, which he, after careful examination, characterized as wicked perversions and corruptions of the holy word of God. These versions he condemned as calculated to subvert religion and to destroy the faith of the people. But neither in these briefs nor in any other authoritativ document did he prohibit the laity from reading the Bible in a genuin and approved translation. A short abstract of his briefs may gratify the curiosity of your readers and suffice to indicate the true import and character of these ecclesiastical papers. The first of those on papal briefs is dated June 29, 1816. It is addressed to Ignatius, bishop of Gnesen. This prelate had consulted the pope as to the course which he should pursue regarding certain translations of the Bible which were being industriously circulated among the Catholic people of Poland by agents of Protestant Bible societies. The pope in reply directed that the visiting disciplinary law of the church, as established in 1757, relativ to versions of the sacred scripture, should be observed, and requested that a copy of the translation referred to should be forwarded to him for examination. His request having been complied with, a second brief treating of the same subject was issued by him on September 3d, the same year. This document was addressed to Stanislaus, bishop of Mohelew. In it the pontiff says that he "had learned with great and bitter sorrow that the most holy Bible, translated into new vernacular versions, in which the meaning of the scripture is craftily distorted into a perverted sense and the most salutary rules of the church are violated, is being everywhere circulated. From an examination of the copies which had been submitted to him he had observed that this translation was designed to destroy the holiness of the more pure doctrin, so that the faithful might drink deadly poison from those fountains from which they were accustomed to imbibe the waters of salutary wisdom."

Having explained that the church received as authentic only the Latin Vulgate version, and approves of other versions only when they are furnished with notes extracted from the fathers or from other Catholic authors, he proceeds to remark on the danger of the sacred scriptures being corrupted in popular translations, and observes that "as the vernacular is subject to very frequent vicissitudes, variations, and alterations, that immutability which becomes the divine oracles would be destroyed by an immoderate license of translating the Bible, and faith itself would totter, especially as disputes concerning the truth of a doctrin may arise from a single syllable." Therefore heretics, although marvelously discordant in their different views and reviling and criticising one another, hav been accustomed to agree and coöperate in this evil and most execrable design, that by issuing Bibles in the vernacular they may insidiously communicate their errors, cloaked by the more holy sanction of the divine word. "For heresies," as St. Augustine says, "are engendered only when the scriptures, good in themselvs, are not properly understood, and that which in them is not rightly understood is rashly and boldly asserted."

The epistle of Pope Innocent III. to the diocese of Metz is cited, in which it is said that "the profundity of the divine scripture is so great that not only the simple and illiterate, but even the prudent and the learned, are incompetent to determin its meaning." The constitutions of Pope Pius IV., Clement VIII., and Benedict IV. are referred to, in which precautions were taken lest by being open at pleasure to all the scriptures might be despised and be exposed to contempt or being erroneously understood by unenlightened readers, might lead into error. "The bull Unigenitus is referred to as condemning the assertion of Quesnell that it is necessary at any time, in every place, and for any class of people to know the mysteries of sacred scripture," and the brief concludes by reprimanding Bishop Stanislaus for his dereliction of duty in having sanctioned the circulation of these objectionable and erroneous translations of the Bible, and for his unfaithful citation of some passages from the decrees of the council of Trent, and for the letters of Pius VI., by which he had sought to justify his conduct.

Such is the substance of these briefs, which certainly contain nothing that any fair-minded Christian could censure. They are evidently dictated by a feeling of profound reverence for the holy word of God, and it is manifest that the author of them was actuated by two most laudable motivs, the desire to preserve intact and incorrupted by erroneous translations the sacred deposit of divine revelation, and the desire to preserve from the danger of losing the true Christian faith those who, being ignorant and unstable, were liable to wrest the scriptures to their own destruction.

From the Press-Register of February 13th.

Below is published a letter from Miss Helen Gardener in reply to the opinion of a Catholic authority which appeared last week upon the question as to whether Catholics were forbidden to read the Bible. It should prove satisfactory to both parties, as it seems they were arguing upon different premises. There is one loophole in Miss Gardener's statement, however, which will bear explanation. She said in her original letter:

Many Catholics had taken the liberty to read the Bible, and were growing restiv to such a degree that in the year of grace, 1817, Pius VII., on June 29th, condemned the reading of the Bible by papal bull.

She never mentioned that she referred to the American Bible. The Bible meant in the above extract referred to the editions which were denounced by the Catholic church as heretical. Had Miss Gardener stated which of the many Bibles she meant, there would hav been no editorial comment, and consequently no correspondence on the subject. Here is her letter:

"In answer to your request that I personally reply to an article in the Press-Register of February 6th, which was headlined: 'A Question of History—Miss Helen Gardener's Strictures on the Catholic Church—Reply to the Remarks by a Local Authority—She Claims that Catholics Were Forbidden to Read the Bible, While the Theologian Cites History to Prove the Contrary,' I hav only this to say: I hav always made it a rule to avoid newspaper debates—not at all because I do not think them valuable at many times, but because it would take too much of my time and energy to keep track of such strictures as are made by contributors to local papers after I hav lectured in a town and left.

"In the present case, however, I find the position so droll that I am tempted to infringe my own rule, and send you a brief response to be used as you see fit.

"It might be interesting to those who read the article appended to the headlines given above to be told that I am neither an Atheist nor an Anarchist, as was implied. The fact should be very well known, for I hav stated it many times, and I hav never upon any occasion, whether public or private, said anything which could be construed by any fair-minded person to imply that I am either one.

"I am an Agnostic in religion, not 'because of ignorance of history,' but because I hav been something of a student of religious history for many years.

"As to Anarchy, I am convinced that it is simply orthodoxy gone to seed on earth instead of in 'heaven.' If we were 'angels'—had no bodies, desires, limitations, and selfishness; if we were, all of us, allwise, and, in short, perfect, we could apply what I understand to be the principles of Anarchy. But its principles impress me as simply those of the Christian 'millennium'—when the lion and the lamb are to lie down together and the lamb is not to be inside of the lion. In my opinion it won't work so long as the lion is a lion and has an appetite, and so long as spring lamb is within reach.

"But why professed Christians should object to the theory of Anarchy—their own millennium theory—being talked, I cannot see. However, I insist that until I talk it I should not be saddled with it, and until I believe in it as a working theory I decline to accept the soft impeachment. Now as to the other points. It is so extremely droll to me that a 'Catholic authority' should hav proved my case for me, that I confess I enjoyed it a good deal.

"The headlines indicate that he disproved what I said. He did exactly the contrary.

"In my lecture I was, as everyone knew, talking about the Bible; that is to say, the book that we in America call by that name—the one used by the courts to swear witnesses upon and the one used to read in the public schools.

"The 'Catholic authority' agrees that this book is not approved of in the hands of Catholics, and although he says that no bull was issued by Pope Pius VII. regarding the use of the Bible, he confirms what I said as to the fact at issue. He calls the promulgations 'briefs' instead of 'bulls,' but says there were two of them instead of one. Well, I am satisfied with that. If he called them 'open letters' or 'proclamations' or any other special name and left the fact not only undisputed, but confirmed, I can't see what I hav to reply to.

"He seems to say that I was offering adverse criticism upon these 'briefs' (I accept his name for this occasion), while the contrary is true. I said most distinctly that I thought it a very wise thing to do. I said: "The Catholic church is the only one that shows good sense" in this matter of reading the Bible. 'It don't allow its followers to read the Bible, and the result is that it is the only church not thoroughly honeycombed with unbelief to-day.' In substance, the 'Catholic authority' says the same thing. He says: The church received as authentic only the Latin Vulgate version and approves of the other versions only when they are furnished with notes extracted from the fathers or from other Catholic authorities, etc.

"Now, as what we call the Bible—the one used in America by courts and schools—is not the Latin Vulgate, and as it is not furnished with the notes required, and as it is the 'version he—the pope—condemned as calculated to subvert religion and destroy the faith of the people'—the 'vernacular version'—I am in the position of being asked to prove a case which my critic has amply proved for me.

"Further on my critic cites other authorities than Pius VII., which also prove my statement, for it is necessary to keep in mind what Bible is under discussion. But surely it were unnecessary to go out of our own country for proof of the Catholic church's objection to its reading by her ordinary adherents. If this were not so, I might cite the case of the Medal family in France, who were thrown into prison, as late as 1848 or 1850, for having in their house what we call the Bible and use officially in America as such.

"But let us remain at home. Are we not all perfectly aware that in many cities in this country the Catholic children are allowed, by order of the boards of education, to remain outside of the public school rooms until after the close of the 'reading, without comment,' of the Bible at opening service?

"There was a famous court trial over this point only a few years ago in Cincinnati. It is a familiar specter—this Bible reading and Catholic children—in the public schools, to all who are familiar with the history of our schools.

"Now, I am heartily in sympathy with the Catholics in this matter. I don't believe we hav any right to use the money of the taxpayers to sustain Bible reading to classes of children who come from families some of whom are Jew, some Catholic, and some Agnostic. In any and all such cases the Bible is an offense, and in any case it is not a public-school study. We will say that the opening religious service of a public school takes one half-hour and that the school hours are five each day—leaving out recesses and intermissions. The actual number of hours of 'school work' paid for by the taxpayer is five hours daily. Now, one-tenth of this time is devoted to a book which is not in the course of study and has nothing at all to do with the alleged object for which public-school taxes are levied on Jew and Catholic, on believer and on unbeliever, alike. This fact has led to too many heated contests in our country for anyone to be justified at this late day in saying that the Catholic church approves of its adherents reading the Bible.

"To evade the point by talking about the Latin Vulgate, which is not what is known as the Bible in this country, is to simply juggle with words and depend on the ignorance of readers for safety.

"To say that 'Miss Gardener uttered a clear-cut falsehood, displayed ignorance of history' in saying that the Catholic church did not allow its believers to read the Bible, is—aside from the manner of the criticism—(which is, of course, a matter of taste), an evasion of the fact unworthy of so able a paper as the Press-Register. It is a juggling with words. It is distorting the use of a word under cover of double meaning. What is called the Bible in this country is the one the 'Catholic authority' knows full well to be the book that the 'briefs' or 'bulls' or 'epistles' or 'fulminations' or whatever he may choose to call them, were issued against. That is what I said, and that is what my Catholic critic admits in spite of the headlines, which would lead a careless reader to think otherwise. When we argue, do let us use words with a par value, else all discussion were mere verbal gymnastics—as, in fact, most theological ones are. Let us be fair. Let us be frank, and when we are talking about another book let us say so. Of course, we all know that Catholics and Protestants do not call the same book the Bible, but it was perfectly plain what book I was talking about.

"But I said then, and I say again, that I think it is a display of wisdom and good sense on the part of the Catholic church to be a little particular about the class of literature it puts into the hands of the public as 'sacred.' The thirty-first chapter of Numbers and a good many others in the Bible are certainly not conduciv to good morals.

"So, hand in hand with the 'Catholic authority,' I bow myself out of a controversy which has had from the first only one side when words were used with a par value, and I am inclined to smile at the company in which I find myself. But I said before, and I repeat, that in my opinion the Catholic church is the only one that shows good sense about the Bible—and this is for more reasons than one. Its position is the only logical one, and if I were a Catholic (and if I were a Christian at all I'd hav to be a Catholic) I should continue to object to having the Bible read to my children (if I had any) in the public schools or anywhere else, as a revelation of the will of a good God. HELEN H. GARDENER."

The Golden Age of Science.

It is an experience to which few of us are strangers that we liv through the golden days of our lives unconsciously, unwittingly—never realizing until they hav receded into the distant past that we are not again to know a time so happy and gainful. That never again are we to learn so much and so pleasantly, or to see the horizon of achievement and enjoyment widen before us with so much of impulse and invitation. It may be the zestful time of one's college days, when success seems so near that one feels inclined to forego it out of pure generosity to other less certain winners in life's race. Or, it may be that in some extended tour we hav traveled through a land of fame and beauty, beheld its palaces and temples, its treasures of sculpture and painting, and gazed upon its scenes much as when we hav journeyed through other lands and climes. Yet it was Spain or Italy or Switzerland that yielded the impressions which really moved us, and which must ever remain the most delightful and fruitful of our recollection. At home or abroad, by good fortune we fall in with some strong, genuin soul, who may be famous, but who more probably does not join ambition for distinction with the power to attain it; he speaks new truths to us, or old truths with a new impressivness. Long afterward we reflect upon the tangle of influence which has shaped our lives, and find his the most decisiv contribution, although when he spoke to us we thought to hav from others words as weighty, incitement as inspiring.

Somewhat thus is mankind now unwittingly living in a golden age, in a time of creativ energy, broadening horizons, new revolutionary truth—an age which the race for centuries to come will esteem great and memorable as the epochs of Pericles, Augustus, or Elizabeth. Like travel-worn wayfarers, whose delight in a new and commanding prospect suffers subtraction in the fatigues and perplexities of their journey, the strife through which the great conquests of our time hav been reached prevents our prizing them as they deserve In eras of the past triumphs hav been won in the fields of empire, art, imagination; those of this age are in the universal realms of science. Not a few men of prophetic vision had glimpses of these triumphs long ago. More than two centuries hav passed since George Herbert could say:

> Nothing hath got so far
> But man hath caught and kept it as his prey.
> His eyes dismount the highest star,
> He is in little all the sphere.
> Herbs gladly cure our flesh, because that they > Find their acquaintance there.

And how much richer is nature, as we know it today, than the nature of the times of the first Charles! Not only has man been winning knowledge from her in a thousand fields of exploration, experiment, and philosophy, but each of the myriad strands in her skein is traced subtly bound to every other in ways unimaginable to the most piercing intellects of eras past. Some of George Herbert's finest lyrics were inspired in the garden he loved to pace, but how much more he would see around him there were he living now! He would find the whole scheme of heavens and earth implicated in that garden's beauty. Its soil telling of forces of storm and heat and chemic war, all at work, in time too extended for computation, to grind primeval rock to fertility. He would see the incomparable tints of every flower conferred by diverse elements aflame in an orb a celestial diameter away; elements akin to the flower's own substance. Other indebtedness would come out in the account of tribes of buzzing insects surrounding each blossom, insects which, while sipping a flower, lend vital aid in continuing its race.

No hue or scent here without its use in enticement of this winged ministry! And were the poet's garden only various enough in its tenantry, he might count among his flowers kinds strictly conforming to the mold of their insect visitors. Wheresoever he might turn his eye in the whole realm of nature he would see it fuller, richer; its every province more intimately interlaced, than when he penned his quaint, suggestiv lines on Man and Providence.

Whilst the study of nature has been revealing so much as the generations hav swept along, there has been a parallel advance in knowledge at work, and a parallel alliance there of near and remote. As the web of science is unfolded the more closely do we find its threads knit together.

At the beginning of this century certain salts of silver were found sensitiv to light, and photography was born. In its latest employment it has reproduced books; caught every detail of a bird's flight; reduced to trifling dimensions the manuscript of a cyclopedia: taken impressions from a score or a hundred faces and by emphasizing the outlines in which they agree, presented us with the curious pictures of a typical man or woman. Progress in photography is no more than abreast of progress in chemistry, electricity, engineering. Every discovery of a cardinal fact and law extends the range of applied science with a bound, and with a bound which ever lengthens. For each fact and law has a vital tie with every other, and adds one to the multiplier enriching thought and life; when the capital of science increases, so also does the rate of interest at which it compounds.

In its material and immediate sphere, we are in little danger of forgetting the rapid growth of the wealth of science. We are daily informed of some fresh marvel of ingenuity in railroad appliances, in the creation of naval and engineering architecture.

Every newspaper tells us of some new piece of scientific ingenuity—electric, telescopic, telephonic—all intended to extend human powers, or to confer upon man powers totally new. Remarkable as all these practical applications of science may be, it is not in these so much as in its enlargement and correction of human thought that this age will be memorable for all time. Upon men not yet old, new heavens and new earth hav dawned in the successiv decades of their lives. A generation or so ago the word "universe" had a significance faulty and meager in comparison with its meaning to-day. To be sure, the visible contents of space were regarded as one, but that there was an equal unity of law, of sequence in nature, was not understood. Then, current theories of the universe were theories of creations, annihilations, suspensions of natural law. Year by year has science advanced until order has at last dislodged magic from every stronghold of her ancient territory; the universe has been discovered to be in agreement with itself.

In an important point of view the history of modern knowledge is the history of identification, of tracing the many in the one, of reducing what seemed an antagonism to concord, difference to unity. It was in physics that this process of identification first took place. Forty years ago electricity was imagined a fluid. Chemical affinity was deemed absolutely different from either heat or mechanical motion. Observers and experimenters hav in our day established that every phase of physical force is in its last analysis motion and is therefore identical with every other; that throughout all its maze of transformation its quantity remains ever the same. That all phases of force are comparable to the mutually convertible orbits which the various parts of a machine may describe in air—volutes, spirals, circles, waves. And with respect to matter as well as motion there seems to be good ground to think it fundamentally one. Spectroscopy displays an increasing simplicity of substance the higher the temperature of a nebula, so that it would seem that the "elements" of chemistry may be but the variously grouped aggregations of some simplest substance. A strange confirmation of the faith in transmutation entertained by alchemists of old! Half-way in the century's course physical science was, as it were, a succession of islands in an archipelago, each isolated and distinct from its neighbors. Even while we watched they arose, and the retiring waters showed a connected continent, speedily parceled out among sturdy bands of explorers. That the wave circling out from the paddle, the musical note pulsating the air, the throb of electricity, the grasp of magnetism, the impulse of gravitation, the vibrant heat and light shot forth from fuel, sun, and star, the stimulus to chemical union, the subtle energy of animal and plant, are in all their diversity fundamentally one, is a conception as grand as ever dignified human thought. Truly the faithful, patient men, whose gift to mankind it is, are

> Unifiers of a united world,
> For wheresoever their clear eyebeams fell
> They caught the footsteps of the same.

Of like mold are the students who hav still further broadened the glory of our age by proving evolution to be the law of nature's history; who hav shown that, however structureless the universe may hav been in the distant past—whether glowing solid, seething liquid, or lambent gas—yet within its bosom lay all the possibilities of the worlds around us. Lyell laid the foundation of the theory of development when he established the sufficiency of forces at work in modern times to account for the earth's geological history. Spectroscopy continued the impulse in a new path by giving support to Kant's nebular hypothesis, and by showing the innumerable host of heaven to be built up of like materials with our globe. Von Baer added suggestiv corroboration by his discovery that the history of the development of a race from lower forms is recapitulated in the transformations undergone by every individual before birth. The arch of evidence of evolution arose rapidly under the hands of these men, yet its span required an explanation of how species came to be and how man has ascended from humble forms of life. An arch all but finished may lack only a keystone to complete it; that added, it has strength and beauty; that wanting, it has neither. When Darwin supplied the keystone of evolutionary evidence in the facts of natural selection and the descent of man, then, and then only, did the law of universal development fairly come into the possession of mankind—a law, surely, of profoundest significance. By demonstrating nature to be a family, it gives classification genetic relationship as its true basis. To education it indicates a new method, and the best, for the order in which the faculties unfold is manifestly the order in which they can best be trained.

It makes possible writing nature's history backward to the time when only chaos was, chaos as wonderful in the order enwrapped within it as the universe developed in the æons. The universe it made one in a new sense, for it bound together, in a single web of causation, systems, worlds, life, mind. To hav lived when this great truth was advanced, debated, established, is a privilege to men rare in the centuries. The inspiration felt by those who hav seen the old, isolating mists dissolve until each branch of knowledge can be traced to convergence in one mighty tree, is not to be known to men of a later generation, who are of those who inherit, not of those who win. Fortunate are they who liv in a golden age like this, when ideas of the first magnitude mount above the horizon, who are young enough to be adequately impressed by them, sufficiently mature to feel their significance and think out their implications.

Whilst our conceptions of nature hav been immeasurably extended, in that her forces hav been shown to be essentially one, and her substance essentially one, despite an ever-unfolding variety and complexity; in that law has been proved to reign throughout space in every manifestation of force, and throughout time in every transformation of matter, yet more has betided the great epoch in which we liv. Nothing else than the dignifying and perfecting the instrument by which these tremendous accessions to thought hav been carved out—the scientific method—now confessed the one trustworthy means for the winning of all truth. It is too soon to forecast its future victories, for the men who wield it are too few and too newly drilled to hav more than begun an attack which not only in the sphere of natural science, but in the fields of art, history, and criticism, in reforms, moral, social, and political, must ever gather strength and sweep. Yet already the vanguard of the army of science is assembled and in motion; we can see the direction its forces are taking, and the disciplin under which they advance. In all its work, artistic, literary, critical, in fields of reform, it means reality, accuracy, fidelity to the directly observed and carefully comprehended fact. It disregards traditions, legends, and guesses, however closely associated with great names or ancient institutions. In their stead it is erecting a new authority, which finds its sanctions in knowledge, in observation, experiment, reasoning; in untiring, impartial verification. Glad when it can find, as it often can, that men of old time had a forefeeling of modern, scientific truth, but under all circumstances loyally pledged to declare exactly what it discovers, however much that loyalty may cause a valued heritage to be disprized. Triumphs to us inconceivable doubtless await the centuries to come, but there will remain as the inalienable glory of the nineteenth, that to the old question, What is truth? it first gave, not the old answer, Whatsoever has been so considered, but Whatsoever can be proved.

In that science has in our age demonstrated what hitherto was only suspected, that the universe has an order both intelligible and ascertainable, it has achieved the religious work of displaying nature as the manifestation of supreme intelligence, not external to it, but immanent in it. What though that order be as yet little understood, the diameter of human ignorance unmeasured? Therein is opportunity and incitement for every man with heart and brain to add to knowledge all he may.

The Pictures.

When the snow blockades in the West are entirely overcome we think the five hundred new subscribers needed to maintain the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER during 1890 will be soon made up. As it is, during the past seven days thirty-five hav been obtained on this account, making three hundred and forty-nine in all. The following donations hav also reached us:

Frank Everly	$3 00	Albert Brooks	1 25
W. A. Dunn	50	A. Moot	1 00
George Cook	75	B. W. Brockway	75
E. D. Blakeman	1 00	Henry R. Teal	1 00
J. H. Graves	1 50	Mary Baird Finch	75

Bringing the total of contributions up to $186 05. Two friends hav also added generously to the Literature Fund—namely:

L. Yeager	$3 00
William Smith	5 00

It is well to remember this fund, in order that work for liberty may be done promptly when occasion arises. During the past week we hav forwarded, at the expense of the American Secular Union, copies of "Sabbath Breaking" to all the Senators and Representativs at Washington. Now that the World's Fair contest is decided, the Sabbath Union people will be working energetically for Congressman Breckinridge's Sunday law for the District of Columbia, and some activ opposition is necessary.

We would again call attention to the offer of "Try Square" as a premium for new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The terms are: Copies of the book to be given as premiums to, or for, new subscribers who pay the regular price of $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, before March 11th. One copy of the book to be given to every volunteer new subscriber, and one to every old subscriber who procures a new one at the regular price of $3. The price of the book by itself is $1.

A Tribute to Our Pictures.

The following paragraph from San Francisco Freethought tells its own story:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER got a good advertisment at the Howard street Methodist church Sunday evening. Dr. Harcourt, the pastor, was discussing old notions of hell and salvation, and exhibited a copy of the paper to illustrate his remarks. The illustration was a cartoon by Heston representing some murderers being launched into eternal bliss by a priest, while their unconverted victims writhed in the flames of hell. Dr. Harcourt said that the picture was the best illustration of the barbarous doctrin he had ever seen, and his congregation, which is among the largest in the city, appeared to agree with him."

That is just what we print the pictures for, to show the people the horribleness of the Christian doctrins—and they do it. They may not always be pretty, but they are always strong, and each one points a moral and enforces an argument against superstitious teaching. Think of the good effect that one picture had upon a whole churchful of Methodists. If it aided them to get the idea of hell out of their heads it was worth the cost of the pictures for a whole year.

Parochial Schools.

Bishop Wigger, of Newark, has ordered the priests of his charge to notify all Catholic parents that, in accordance with the decree of the plenary council at Baltimore, they must send their children to Catholic schools under penalty of denial of absolution.

This order is in pursuance of the now well-known policy of the Romish authorities to withdraw all Catholic children from public schools in order to eventually obtain "separate" schools, conducted by the sects but supported by the state. At present there is little likelihood of this being brought about, at least in the East, and the bishop's order is a matter which chiefly concerns Catholic parents and children, the latter not having very brilliant chances of getting even a decent elementary education.

The Protestants in Newark are much exercised at the order, and say it should be resisted as dangerous and revolutionary. But as to this, we fail to see how the state can properly intervene. If the Catholics provide the schools at their own expense, they are certainly entitled to them and to send their children to them. There can be no question about this right, any more than there can be concerning the right of parents to send their boys to Methodist, Presbyterian, or Episcopal colleges.

The danger of these parochial schools to the public lies in another phase.

In many towns, especially in the West, where these schools hav been established, they hav superseded the public schools, and led to the discontinuance of the latter, or to a material reduction in the length of the school term. This, in one or two instances, was done by the vote of the town, a majority of the voters being Roman Catholics. The priests, controling the voters, said to their Protestant and Freethinking neighbors, Send your children to our schools, or nowhere.

This danger, of course, is to be feared only where the Catholics control the township or municipality; but where they do, the danger is great, and will require firm statesmanship to meet it. Under local school rule, there is no way to meet it; it must be done by state laws, compelling every town to provide sufficient school accommodation and length of school term to insure every child at least an elementary education. The right of a Catholic to use a religious school cannot be interfered with; but in this way the churches are prevented from interfering with the public schools.

"God's Warnings."

The Rev. David McAllister is one of the fanatics of the National Reform Association, the members of which constitute the God-in-the-Constitution party. For a recent sermon at Pittsburgh Mr. McAllister took as a text, "The Washington Calamity; God's Call to National Repentance." The calamity referred to is the terrible deaths met by Secretary Tracy's wife and daughter—a calamity which all decent people can only lament, silently sympathizing with the widowed survivor. But Mr. McAllister had the heartless impudence to say:

"This government has always been ready to acknowledge the blessings of God. Proclamations are issued by the president and the governors of the different states, calling upon the people to giv thanks for the blessings of the year. Why, then, should we not be ready to acknowledge the chastening hand of a divine providence? The view is held by many that calamities are to be regarded without any consideration as things caused by providence. This view is incorrect. We as a Christian nation must appreciate that God's hand, while dealing out blessings, is also powerful to blight or to bring about those things which we do not call blessings.

"The question now arises, where is the reason for the singular train of calamities which has of late attended the course of those who hold the reins of our government? The question can be answered. It can be answered when the course of the present administration is pointed out—when we observe how its actions correspond with the tone of a Christian people. Take, for the first, the last Thanksgiving proclamation issued by President Harrison. In it thanks were directed to be offered by this Christian nation, but there was not even a reference to Jesus Christ. Had the omission of this sacred name been accidental or caused by lack of forethought the case would not be so glaring.

"But President Harrison was waited on by a committee and was earnestly solicited to insert in the proclamation the name of Jesus Christ. In the face of this Mr. Harrison refused to make the insertion.

"Then come other official actions which are equal to this. Balls and festivities were given to which representativs of countries from all over the globe were invited and came. Many of these occasions, while not openly official, yet the manner in which they were given made them at least semi-official. And at every guest's plate three or four wine glasses were placed, and the wine was as plentiful as the food.

"In many other ways the present administration has been a disappointing one to the Christian people of this land. It was expected that with so many men in high and responsible positions who were stanch members of the Christian church, many long-looked-for reforms would be made. To-day in this great Christian country we are in many respects behind some of Europe's dynasty-stricken governments. The name of God is not mentioned in the Constitution. Although the land is filled with societies covering every line of moral work and trying to help on the great cause, yet in many instances they fail because they hav not the proper backing.

"From these things it is natural to suppose that providence intends the recent Washington happenings as a warning to the nation. Many of our people feel this and the reported close of the so-called social season in Washington is perhaps a sign that, while the ways of providence are often mysterious, they are at other times plain warnings to nations. Those who were struck down in Washington were not any worse than their fellow-citizens; but the latter should not fail to heed God's warning."

It is a too apparent fact that the rulers of this country hav been assigning to an unknown and unknowable quantity credit for the prosperity and welfare of the country which properly belongs to the people, but this was not one of their legal duties but only a way they took to thrust their private opinions upon others. But that neglect to still more outrageously abuse the privileges of their offices by acknowledging a particular divinity of a particular religion should call down upon them the wrath of this unknown and unknowable quantity, called God, is so ridiculous an assertion that its maker seems out of place in any house but one devoted to the cure of the insane. That Secretary Tracy's family should be burnt up because wine was used at a public dinner shows a conception of God so hideous that one not a professed and professional Christian would be called blasphemous should he hold it. Besides, Mr. McAllister's God was once fond of wine himself, if the sacred book does not tell us falsely.

There is one paragraph in this report of Mr. McAllister's raving that is probably news to many—that is, that President Harrison was asked and refused to insert the name of Jesus Christ in his Thanksgiving proclamation. The statement reveals the astounding fanatical effrontery of the National Reform Association people. Jesus Christ—if he ever lived—has no more to do with this government than has Julius Cæsar, or any other dead Jew or Roman. To use his name as requested of Mr. Harrison, would hav been a flagrant outrage upon all Americans, and a miserable offense to those of other nationalities who do not recognize nor believe the Christian religion. It would hav been a betrayal of trust, and that it should be asked of those "men in high and responsible positions who are stanch members of the Christian church," speaks badly for the honor and morality of the Reform Association. The men who compose the Association seem to be exceedingly unscrupulous demagogs.

And, furthermore, to prove, if proof were needed, that this is so, we may say that the men or Associations who are not satisfied with the piety of this administration must be hard indeed to suit.

The Illinois Supreme Court.

The supreme court of Illinois is not regarded by the Chicagoans as possessing very sound judgment. One of the judges has recently granted a writ of error in the case of Neebe, one of the imprisoned Anarchists, and if the writ be sustained it will giv all of those unfortunate men now alive a new trial, and make the execution of the others a monstrous legal blunder. In view of this "freak," as the Journal calls the issuance of the writ, "there will be an unsatisfactory feeling regarding any decision the supreme court may render."

Another cause of complaint against the court is the report that a question regarding Catholic church property is likely to be interposed, though why the property of that church is more interested than the property of other churches, says the Journal, is hardly visible to the naked eye. It is said that church property is exempt from general taxation, but not from special assessments, and that the Catholics will therefore vigorously oppose any plan but that of general taxation or of bonds, both being ultimately the same. Judge Prendergast, who is the board, is a devout Catholic, and perhaps this fact caused the question to be raised as regards that church only. But it affects all church property alike in proportion to its value. Furthermore, it is thought that Judge Prendergast, who has now qualified as one of the city's sanitary trustees, must resign his county judgeship. The Journal says that undoubtedly the two offices are incompatible, as Prendergast as judge has to pass on the acts of Prendergast and his colleagues as trustees—that is, in case of special assessments which the county court must approve.

Considering the procedure of the supreme court in convicting the Anarchists, and then when popular clamor has in a measure subsided, granting a writ of error in their cases; and the further astonishing action in the case of the St. Mary's Training School, where a former plain decision was not followed because of the sympathy of one judge with the new defendant, it is not to be regarded as remarkable that the people are losing confidence in the court. If the judges pronounce one thing legal at one time, and its opposit legal and right at another, citizens of Illinois will not know whether the judges are exercising the very human prerogativ of changing their minds, or whether they ever knew what is law and had any but very hazy notions of what is right.

A Committee on Public Safety.

At its meeting on February 21st the Manhattan Liberal Club passed these resolutions and appointed A. A. Levy, Lucien Saniel, and Dr. Huldah F. Gunn the Committee named therein:

"WHEREAS, Recent events in this community and elsewhere throughout the country indicate the existence of a conspiracy on the part of certain religious authorities acting in conjunction with the capitalistic class, to restrict and restrain the usefulness of the public school system of the United States by crippling its resources through the inadequate appropriation of public money and otherwise, thus preventing the growth of the common school system in due proportion to the increase of the population, and otherwise, the expectation of both parties to this conspiracy being that, by this means, they will finally be able to limit the public education of the masses to the most elementary branches, and thus, by keeping them in comparativ ignorance, prevent the increasing dissatisfaction of the working people with existing social conditions from finding expression, and

"WHEREAS, The keeping in comparativ ignorance of the people is thus frankly and brutally admitted to be the common reliance of the ministers of superstition and those who profit by the present state of social injustice, and

"WHEREAS, It is highly important that, in this crisis, the friends of humanity, the lovers of political and religious freedom, and the advocates of social justice should begin to combine against their common enemy, therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Manhattan Liberal Club hereby appoints a standing committee of three, with full power, whose duty it shall be to invite the coöperation of all other societies, clubs, and organizations of like opinions, aspirations, and tendencies by the appointment of similar committees to work in unison in every possible way for the protection of the liberties, the education, and social and governmental interests of the people, and the furtherance of religious and civic freedom and social justice among men, and be it further

"Resolved, That this committee be known as the Committee of Public Safety."

There is no doubt that the primary public schools of this city are of little value, and that there is an attempt being made by a certain element to render them still more worthless. The method of instruction is not wise nor efficient. A child will learn more in a New England country school in six months than he will in a New York school in twice the time. And the disturbing element is not so much the "capitalistic" class as it is the Catholic church. The object of the church of course is to hav insufficient public school accommodations and so drive more children into the church schools. The Sun is about the only "capitalistic" representativ which has expressed a desire to limit the education provided by the public schools to a mere elementary course, and the Sun is well known as a caterer to Catholicism.

There is a bill now before the legislature at Albany, introduced in the senate by Mr. Ahearn and advocated in the assembly by Mr. Dinkelspiel, which this Committee of Public Safety will do well to watch. The bill provides for an increase of the Board of Education from twenty-one to twenty-four members, and requires that each member of the Board shall be appointed from a separate city district, and shall be at the time an actual resident of the district he represents. The idea is to get upon the Board a large number of members from below Fourteenth street and those living on the east and west sides of the town, where the Catholics run things. At present there is only one member of the Board residing below Fourteenth street, while if the bill becomes a law the number would be increased to sixteen. In all these wards the Catholics control the elections and the appointments. With members of the board from such districts the church could do very nearly as she pleased with our schools, and everybody knows pretty well what that would be.

The Committee on Public Safety can safely let the capitalistic element alone for a while and devote their time and energies to watching the Roman Catholic church.

The Unreasonableness of Christians.

The Ithaca Daily Journal recently made this sentiment of a contemporary its own:

"Another hideous evil is perpetrating iniquity in the name of religion. The faith cure which leaves an ailing person deprived of the rational means of help and restoration to health through an impudent relegation of the invalid to supernatural restoration, should be suppressed by law."

This subject, says Judge Stephen Brewer, a distinguished jurist of that city, will bear a little closer examination. Viewed from the standpoint of mere worldly wisdom, the animadversion would seem to be quite in the line with right thinking; but examined in the light of Bible religion, it is without doubt open to the charge of being wise above what is written.

It can never be too often impressed upon the alleged Christian public, that in this matter either the New Testament or the doctors hav got to go. The New Testament is very plain—both in the King James and the revised version—on the subject. "Is any sick among you?" asks James. "Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." This doctrin is in harmony also, as Judge Brewer points out, with other passages of the "holy writ." The language used is not ambiguous nor vague. It is a direct and pointed prescription, as plainly so as a direction to take Dr. Lyon's cough balsam for an irritation of the throat. It cannot be explained away; it is not an interpolation—though, to be sure, no one knows who wrote the epistle of James; it is just as authoritativ and as much inspired as any other portion of the Bible. And yet no one but a few "Christian scientists," called cranks for short, believes it to be meant for anything but a "glittering generality;" certainly no rational Christian would think of adopting it. They look upon it, practically, as they regard another exclamation of the same author:

"Go to now, ye rich, weep and howl for your miseries that are coming upon you. . . . Your gold and your silver are rusted; and their rust shall be for a testimony against you, and shall eat your flesh as fire."

Christians strive for riches, and send for a doctor to prolong their enjoyment of them. And the great body of them do not read their Bible. If it was once read to them so they understood it, they would, as Thoreau says, leave the meeting-house, and there would not be one stone of it left upon another. It is only because they do not know it, and it is never explained to them, that they believe the Bible. Let them be consistent and either repudiate it—as they repudiate the greater portion of the sermons and traditions of centuries ago—or cease putting men in jail for practicing its plain teachings—or let them liv up to it in its entirety. This last, of course, would be a calamity, but it would hasten the advent of a true civilization, for as the Ithaca jurist puts it, it is safe to predict that immediately on the advent of such a time and such living on the part of the great body of Christians, the world's attention in this age of progress would be startlingly arrested; blind eyes would be opened; deaf ears would be unstopped; error and superstition, made conspicuous, would be sure to get a tremendous set-back, and truth and common sense would receive an impulse as prompt as it would be memorable and beneficent.

Editorial Notes.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S latest speech, "Crimes Against Criminals," makes a pamphlet of nearly fifty pages. It is printed in the same elegant shape that Mr. Farrell affects with all of his great relativ's works, and sells for ten cents. THE TRUTH SEEKER will supply the public.

THE National Guardian, published in Calcutta, India, transfers to its title-page the picture adorning the same page of THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 28th. It is a telling thrust at the missionaries in India, and the National Guardian has done well in reprinting it. It brings the lesson home to the very people the church is after.

IT is pretty certain that when the next General Assembly of the Presbyterian church meets it will revise its Confession of Faith. And now some Methodists think that there are some doctrins taught in their churches which are behind the times, and need the pruning-knife. At this rate the churches will revise Christianity out of existence, leaving but a lot of church buildings in which Sunday lectures and week-day entertainments may be held.

THE Rev. Dr. Driver is in Washington state advertising himself in his lecture notices thus: "Dr. Driver is celebrated as the only man who ever defeated Robert G. Ingersoll on his own ground." A subscriber at Port Townsend desires to know "on what point Dr. Driver defeated Colonel Ingersoll." We are sorry not to be able to enlighten our friend, but we really do not know. Colonel Ingersoll does not know either. No one knows but Dr. Driver, and he is reticent on the subject, as becomes a modest man.

A PRETTY good specimen of the kind of clerks we now hav in our city government under Tammany Hall is the one revealing himself by his penmanship and orthography on the back of a jury notice served on the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER last week. The individual summoned is called an "editEr" and his place of business is marked as in "LafEyette" place. If the penmanship could be reproduced the scholarly attainments of the clerk would be noted as about on the level with the Editor's boy of ten.

THE Sun two Sundays ago printed a page account of Talmage, in which that reverend gentleman is pretty plainly called, and proved to be, a humbug. His accomplishments as an acrobatic orator, his peculiar attempts to raise money to build his new church, his lack of real influence, his meanness in money matters and thrift in selling sermons he never delivered, his buffoonery at Mars Hill and Calvary, and his general good-for-nothingness as a "soul saver" are all dwelt upon in separate chapters, and the summing up might well be that the Brooklyn mountebank is a commercial Christian, for revenue, and that only, being neither a scholar, sincere preacher, nor unselfish worker for others.

THE Christian Advocate says: "The season thus far in most parts of the country has been unfavorable for special religious services having in view the awakening of communities and the conversion of sinners. The sections ordinarily covered with snow, and affording the finest opportunities for locomotion, hav been submerged beneath oceans of mud. The influenza has silenced for weeks together hundreds of ministers and affected so many of the congregations, especially among the aged—often the most efficient helpers a pastor has in revivals—as to lessen the congregations to one-half or one-third their usual numbers. In many instances, when a hopeful work was begun, the sudden invasion of La Grippe brought everything to a stand, transformed the population into invalids and nurses, and imposed upon the pastor, if not himself a sufferer, the duty of visiting the sick and burying the dead. Where the influenza has not been thus general, many hav been so busy talking and reading about it, and so much afraid of it, that attention has been dissipated and religious activity has ceased." May an unregenerate sinner be allowed to ask why the Lord didn't send the snow, and why he did send the grip?

MR. W. E. REID, the Michigan medium now in the toils of Wanamaker, has revived the Olive Branch, in the last number of which he says: "THE TRUTH SEEKER is without doubt the most conservativ Liberal journal in the world, and yet Liberal in all that the word implies. We are glad to see its readers coming to the rescue so that its engravings can be continued. Those who hav tried it little realize all that it means to continue as a lifework 'Liberal journalism.' Personally, we can never forget that, although differing with us in religious views, it has persistently continued in delivering sledge-hammer blows in defense of the principles involved in the case entitled, 'The United States vs. Walter E. Reid.'" THE TRUTH SEEKER is conservativ (if that be the proper word) because it knows that human beings are fallible and that a man who thinks to-day that he has a scheme which is sure to bring the millennium, is quite apt to find out to-morrow that he may be wrong. It is well to go slow in some things, even at the risk of being called conservativ. Mr. Reid will probably concede this, as he seems to hav a pretty clear idea of the many good qualities of the paper. And, by the way, Mr. Reid has been East but the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and his friend McArthur d d not obtain the promised sitting for slate-writing. Mr. Reid is now attending to business in Grand Rapids, and expects to be tried again some time next month.

PT. PLEASANT, IA., Feb. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year to my address. Also the ANNUAL, and still better, $2.50 for a new subscriber. We both vote for the pictures. Respectfully, M. E. FELTON.

CANDIA, N. H., Feb. 7, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I hav tried hard to get at least one new subscriber, but hav not as yet. Hav mercy on a poor man a little longer, and I will do the best I can. I want to vote for the pictures. Yours truly, with respect, L. C. TRUE.

DWIGHT, ILL., Feb. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I should hav written last week, but I thought that by waiting till now I would get one new subscriber, but failed to do so. I vote for the pictures, but I am unable to help in money for them. WILLIAM WALKER.

CORRECTIONVILLE, IA., Jan. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: A short time since, I promised you a new subscriber. Here he is. Send the copy of "Try-Square," offered as a premium, to the undersigned. We both want the pictures continued. H. G. BLINN.

FORT FAIRFIELD, Feb. 9, 1890.

FRESNO FLATS, CAL., Jan. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find fifty cents for two ANNUALS. Also accept my vote for the continuance of the pictures. At the request of Mr. L. Powel, I send his vote for the continuance of the pictures. W. E. LARAMORE.

NEOSHO, MO., Feb. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad that I can inform you that I hav finally succeeded in getting you a new subscriber at the regular rate of $3, which entitles him to the premium "Try-Square." Add two strong votes for the pictures.

Respectfully, E. SOHOENBORN.

KIOWA, COL., Jan. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav the promis of two subscribers as soon as they get the money. They say Heston is a brick, and so say I. The pictures take well here, and as soon as I get the money to spare I will giv it to pay for them.

FRED. FOLSTER.

BALTIMORE, MD., Feb. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As for the pictures, I do not think you are illustrated enough. I think that many points that are made by Freethought lecturers are now lost that would not be if they were illustrated each with a small cut.

Respectfully, F. A. EVERITT.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Jan. 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to Mr. Heston's pictures, I hope you will continue them, as speaking about matters is never so effectiv as when aided by pictures, and I think we could not offend the other side by illustrating their teaching.

Yours, JOHN BAYER.

GALLUP, N. M., Jan. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and a catalog of Freethought books. I hav been trying to raise a club, but failed. I will try again. I should like to hav the pictures continued. LEE THOMAS.

FRACKVILLE, PA., Jan. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to the following address for 1890. Inclosed find $2 in payment of the same. I would like to see the cartoons continued. I will do all I can to help them along. RICHARD CHAPPELL.

Feb. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $3.25 to renew my subscription and for the ANNUAL. Pictures or not, I must hav the paper. I think the pictures attract more than they repel. They excite the children so they ask a great many questions about them. In that way they are a means of instruction.

SHANNON TODD.

SPENCER, N. Y., Feb. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER four months. We subscribe chiefly on account of the cartoons. We would be pleased to see the picture of those two milch cows drawing the creator of all the shining worlds over the mountain to the coast of Bethshemesh.

Respectfully yours, EAGLE KNIFE WORKS.

ALBERT LEA, MINN., Feb. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken the paper for one year, and I can say that I feel that it has been the cause of making me a better man, morally and in many other ways, than all the religious papers I ever read, or all the orthodox sermons I ever listened to. Continue the cartoons. They are grand.

Yours, etc., G. Q. SLOCUM.

Jan. 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send money for your paper. I want that paper one more year, at least. I am pleased to see the exact likeness of the ancient fools and barbarians of the past. They do not vary much from the present patterns all round us at present. But Heston must be the greatest seer of this age. Y. E. MCCLENDON.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Feb. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 to renew and for a new subscriber, which I take pleasure in sending. In regard to the pictures, as I said before, those on the first page are invaluable. On the last page I think we could do without, and the space could be utilized by the likenesses of notable Freethinkers, perhaps at less expense. JNO. DOWNES.

MIDLAND, FLA., Feb. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890, and the Bruno pamphlet No. 2. The balance is to be applied on the Literature Fund. I vote for the pictures being continued, but can get no subscribers, and only succeed in causing the people to look upon me as some strange, unnatural being.

A. E. KITTELLE.

NEWTON, MONT., Jan. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.25, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER, also the ANNUAL, and the "Secret of the East," by Felix L. Oswald; also please send a copy of "Men, Women, and Gods," by Helen H. Gardener, to the young lady whose address I append. Hoping that the pictures may be continued, I am,

Very respectfully yours, AUSTIN DILTS.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Feb. 7, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I hope you will continue the cartoons. Within the past three weeks a member of the Presbyterian church, by picking up my paper, has been led to think. He begged me to let him read Paine's "Age of Reason." He read it, and is now reading other like works, and I believe that now you could not shoot him back into the church. This, all from seeing those cartoons. JOHN MONROE.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Feb. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Send the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC. I hav not been able yet to get any subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I send all the papers away as soon as read to parties who I think will be interested and appreciate what they contain, and it is possible some may subscribe through that. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a welcome visitor either with or without cartoons.

Yours sincerely, RUTH BRETTELL.

COSUMNES, Jan. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Feeling an interest in the spread of Liberal and Freethought principles, I hav induced a few of my neighbors to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I may add that the subscribers were much pleased with the pictures, and we hope they will be continued. Please find inclosed $16. I also inclose $6, for which send me the inclosed list of works I hav selected from your columns.

W. R. GRIMSHAW.

PLANTSVILLE, CONN., Feb. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Now, while the old subscribers are looking up new subscribers, continue the pictures. If at the end of the year you hav not enough subscribers to make it pay, publish the amount you are short. I would ask all subscribers to make this amount up, and I think they will do it. I shall try for one or two subscribers. Find inclosed money for subscription, ANNUAL, and books named.

Yours respectfully, J. J. WITHAM.

FORT MAGINNIS, MONT., Jan. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL of 1890. I cannot promis you any new subscribers, but will try to get some. There are several Liberals here, and if the pictures are dropped out they will never subscribe. By all means keep Heston at work. The pictures are two-thirds of the paper. Most men like me, raised in the West and self-educated, can read the pictures at a glance and understand them. Anyone who says the pictures ought to go does not know enough to ache when in pain. E. G. ABBOTT.

ARGENTA, Jan. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6 25—$5 to pay for my subscription and that of a friend I hav selected in the distance. $1 is donated to continue the pictures, not only one, but both. Our friend Heston has the power to hang up biblical absurdities by the tail. I hav known Christians to pick up my paper, look at the pictures, turn red in the face at first, and then laugh. Plain cases—don't you see that it does them good? To read of a thing, and to see it, are quite different.

A. BESSETTE.

JAMESTOWN, PA., Jan. 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed please send me the ANNUAL for 1890; the remainder place to the credit of a new subscriber as below. Blow your bugle until the hosts of superstition are compelled to surrender the fort, and the knees of the priests quiver and quake and they cry for the rocks and hills to fall upon them and hide them from impending wrath. We need the pictures. And let me say to our new-born, faint-hearted Liberals, that the truth must pierce the sink of abominations with the force of twenty lightning flashes, and that the pictures help. JERRY BROOKWAY.

OAKLAND, CAL., Feb. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $8—$5 to extend my subscription to your paper for two years, and $3 for the pictures. I believe the cartoons will add to the circulation of the paper. Our leading Sunday papers are illustrated, and they find it takes with the public. So I hope Mr. Heston will go on with his good work, as he seems to understand the Bible thoroughly. Heston would make a splendid lecturer in the Young Men's Christian Association or teacher in Sabbath-schools, as he could make clear on the blackboard the characters and scenery of the Bible. A. W. ROOT.

6 MILE BROOK, N. S., Feb. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5.25 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the book called "Bible Myths," and the ANNUAL. I see a very large majority of patrons vote for Heston and the pictures. I also vote the whole ticket. Heston is worthy of great praise, indeed. Instead of injuring your paper the pictures help it very much. Prayer-meetings and revivals are the order of the day here, so that I can do nothing by way of a new subscriber. The thing is utterly impossible. I wish you would send a copy of your paper to the address of the friend inclosed.

Yours truly, JAMES BARRY.

PINILLAS, FLA., Feb. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER-I am pleased to see that a large proportion of your correspondents are in favor of them. I am also one of that number, and to express my appreciation of them I inclose $5 toward their cost. I notice that almost everyone first looks at the pictures. When the paper was sent to my office everyone there would examin the cartoons, if they did not read the paper. I hav seen the time when such pictures would hav shocked me. I think such shocking very useful to many people. It will set many to thinking where nothing else would. A. H. FRANK.

ASPEN, COL., Feb. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Within the next four weeks I will send you $3 to continue the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am also authorized to promis the same amount from Peter Westerlund, a subscriber and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will send his and my substantial vote at the same time. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and Watson Heston. But we all know that none can liv on air. Why should not all of us do all we can, without material injury to ourselvs, to sustain those who work hard and devote their whole life for the cause that is so dear to us? Let us all do our best.

Sincerely yours, JOHN ENGSTROM.

CANTON, O., Jan. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been seeking for a subscriber ever since my subscription ran out, and hav not yet succeeded. As I cannot get a new subscriber, I will help you on the pictures soon. I do not want the pictures stopped, for I think them the best part of the paper. And if they are stopped my subscription stops also. So keep on if you possibly can. There hav not been any cartoons too rough for me. I am sorry to tell you that they are not half rough enough. I will soon help to keep Heston alive. I cannot send you many names of Liberals for sample copies, but will giv you a few.

Yours for liberty, D. S. AUNGST.

SALEM, O., Feb. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Since sending the money for the renewal of my paper on the 10th of January, I hav observed quite an interest and increase in favor of Mr. Heston's glorious work; but I am apprehensiv that there is not near enough sent in to pay the expenses of Mr. Heston's pictures yet. So you will find inclosed $5, for the encouragement of some of the brethren strong in the faith to do likewise. For the truth's sake do not let the good work linger. You may send me the "Try-Square"—a name of an article that I am somewhat familiar with, having owned and used it at the bench for the greater part of my life. SIMEON SHARP.

ORANGEVILLE, PA, Jan. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4 for which please send one Binder for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1890, one copy of "Antichrist," and four TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS for 1890. The balance apply on the picture fund. I would hav sent three new subscribers if money was not so scarce. I had their promis, but they could not get the money. I think they will subscribe yet, as soon as they can. There would then hav been four more votes for the pictures. I would vote pictures every time, and let those that did not like them look the other way. I think the picture of Robert Burns in the last issue is worth more than the rest of the paper, although it is a very good one. M. S. HAYHURST.

BRIDGEVILLE, CAL., Jan. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: On the 10th of this month, I sent two new subscribers and $3 for books, but forgot to say a word about the pictures. It was the pictures that first caught my eye last September, and I subscribed immediately, and the two new subscribers I sent on the 10th wish the pictures to be continued. I now send two more subscribers, so you can see what the pictures hav done here. I liv in the mountains where houses and Infidels are few and far between, and this winter the roads are bad, which makes hard traveling, but I am doing my best to keep Heston designing. I would like to send four subscribers every month. But there is one thing certain—that I and THE TRUTH SEEKER are joined for life. Please send five ANNUALS as well. W. H. BARNWELL.

BELLEVILLE, Jan. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In the capacity of a true Liberal, I consider it my duty to meet your request regarding the pictures. The evidence has been well weighed on both sides, the balance of which has fashioned in my mind the opinion that those who object to the cartoons are of a pusillanimous spirit and should be termed mushroom thinkers. I hav come to the conclusion that the pictures hav acted as a moral sieve which separates the chaff from the wheat. That is, they hav aided in the work of separating the chaff of superstition from the wheat of truth and equity. You will find inclosed $1. Send me this year's ANNUAL, the balance use to aid the pictures. I will use my best endeavors to get you some subscribers.

Yours sincerely, E. MARSHALL.

ATLANTA, GA., Feb. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: My vote is for Heston and the pictures, and I will back up my vote with a second subscription in favor of my father, which I will send soon. THE TRUTH SEEKER is by all odds the best equipped Liberal journal published in the United States, and I am proud of its advanced position upon all questions affecting the liberty of the human mind. As a Spiritualist, I stand for the widest toleration and freedom of thought. I do not wish to be nothing when the dissolution of the body occurs, so stand upon the platform of belief in spiritualistic existence when the call comes and I lay down the tools of mortal life. With many wishes for the success of your able and liberty-loving paper, I remain,

Yours truly, THOMAS M. TAYLOR.

WASHINGTON, PA., Feb. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5, of which use $4 50 for subscription and books as directed, and fifty cents to pay for Heston's pictures. I wish I was able to do more, but I am not at present. I think the pictures are stronger with a great portion of the people than the columns of print. There is a large portion of the people that cannot read a passage of printed matter and understand anything of it, but show a picture and they are convulsed with either laughter or rage, and either one does them good. It has started something that will in many cases never rest again. I want THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I can pay for it, and it is the free, Liberal, open journal that it is now, and has been since I hav been reading it—that is, the last nine years.

Very truly yours, E. P. BLY.

ROSS, TEX., Feb. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER two years and the ANNUAL for 1890. The pictures are coarse, rough, and distasteful, and do not do anything in the line of Freethought. I hav been skeptical from less than ten years old. My father and mother were Primitiv Baptists. Father was a preacher, and a good man. They taught me lessons of the exalted greatness and goodness of God, his unchangeableness, truthfulness, and purity. Yet I find in the Bible that he changed his purposes often; that he sent lying spirits and strong delusions to peoples that they might err and be severely punished by him; that he ordered not only wicked men slain but sucklings, innocent babies. Such a God is not the God my parents taught me to reverence and adore. A pure god is my god. LEM JONES.

BENMILLER, ONT., Jan. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see my subscription runs out on Jan. 15, 1889, and as I do not wish to lose one copy of the best paper printed I inclose $5.25—$3 for the paper, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL when ready; the balance you can apply where you think it will do the most good, as I cannot get a new subscriber. I wish to do my part, but I am an old man of seventy years, and hav to fight out a living on a farm. And crops not good and prices low make times hard, and my only help is one boy. I hav been trying to get a new subscriber, but cannot. But there were signs of improvement yesterday. I was at the wool factory and the owner said he would like to see some of Ingersoll's works, as he heard he was a hard man to corner. I said I could giv him his "Defense of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy," which I send to-morrow. WILLIAM LONG.

PORT ANGELES, WASH., Jan. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: At a meeting of Freethought people held at Port Angeles on January 26th, a Secular society was organized, with Mr. John Coolidge as president, Laura E. Peters vice-president, Mr. Frank Morse secretary, Mrs. McLoughlin treasurer. The meeting was quite enthusiastic and unanimous on the questions presented for consideration, and the friends of Secularism are well represented in this locality. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Peters were chosen delegates to attend the state convention, and Mr. Adolph Anderson recommended as vice-president of the state Union for this locality. There are about one thousand inhabitants in this vicinity, and about half of them are Liberals. The rest are very Liberal Christians. Mrs. Laura Peters is getting up a club for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours for truth and liberty, Mr. Heston's cartoons included, FRANK MORSE.

WALTON, IND., Feb. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see that a few persons hav advised a way by which Mr. Heston might make the pictures handsome, etc. Their talk sounds as it would for a man to go to Mr. Parton and advise him to go to Colonel Ingersoll and tell the great orator how he should make a speech about the Gods, for fear the tiger might snarl. Heston is as far ahead of his critics as Robert G. Ingersoll is ahead of his carpers. To stop Mr. Heston's pictures would be as damaging to liberty of thought as it would be to muzzle Robert G. Ingersoll from lecturing and writing against priestcraft and old foolish theology. If nature can make a handsome object from a vicious and slimy subject, so can Heston make a handsome picture; otherwise not, and be true to his own genius and subject. You will find inclosed $1 for Heston's abilities, and more before long. E. VAN BUSKIRK, M.D.

ROUND VALLEY, CAL., Jan. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am a subscriber of this paper from its commencement. It is becoming better and better every year, and I wish for its continuance to the end of the world. Its articles are gems, and are calculated to elevate man to glory, wealth, and honor. Its editorials prove scholarship, and reveal a keen investigator. He is in his place, and must be a philosopher. The cartoons are right, for the Bible is wrong. The pictures to the eye are not worse than Ingersoll and Peck to the mind. It is necessary vessels should be procured to hold and carry according to need. In my house there are more than sugar-bowls and honey-dishes. I was going to say, God bless you, but I do not know of any to do it, and the other fellow you do not want. Please find inclosed $10—$6 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $2.50 for "Bible Myths," and $1.50 for the "Hymn Book."

Yours truly, JOHN E. JONES.

FLAT CREEK, LA., Jan. 7, 290.

MR. EDITOR: As you hav called for an expression of opinion in regard to Heston's pictures, I will say that I highly appreciate them, and believe that I can do more effectiv missionary work with the pictures than with the reading matter. I cannot see how any Freethinker can object to the first-page pictures, as they are only pictorial illustrations of facts in history now transpiring. These pictures are apt and fitting, and convey to the mind a more lucid illustration of the facts than can be given in printed words. As to the last-page pictures, they are fitting illustrations of the barbarism and absurdities in the old Hebrew scriptures. Perhaps they grate harshly upon the refined sensibilities of civilized and enlightened people, but they attract attention strongly to these barbarities and absurdities, and their tendency will be to make the church expurgate the Bible or an enlightened and refined people will discard it as old rubbish.

P. F. SHUMAKER.

RIVERSIDE, CAL., Jan. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is twenty-five cents for a copy of the ANNUAL. I hav failed to get a new subscriber as yet, but hav let others hav my paper, and some may hav sent you a subscriber. But I am trying to do all the good I can toward your paper and the cause. I am in favor of the pictures, and think they are more instructiv than the reading of the same to an unthinking person, for the reason that they are always anxious to turn to the Bible to see if such things are truth, when otherwise they would never know the Bible ever contained anything but goodness in it. I think if there was a play got up on the Bible, just as plain as the pictures show, with a little of the Samson vein as a farce just to please the children, the Bible would be hated by the professed Christians.

I hav a boy and I am going to see that he gets schooling. When my paper comes he is anxious to see the pictures, and inquires all about them. He is five years old, and calls my paper "God's paper." THOS. E. PAEK.

LEXINGTON, KY., Feb. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Many thanks are due to Mr. Heston for his truthful picture of woman climbing the hill of difficulty which leads to success and usefulness, with a crowd of sniveling hypocrits trying to keep her back, wishing probably to fling her into some pool of degradation, where she can be easily trampled on and insulted. Mr. Heston is one of nature's noblemen, and his pictures are doing more good in the way of art than any others. I mean that they are a direct means of civilization, and to be depended on as such. But if his health is delicate, I beg that he will furnish them only once a fortnight.

Like ancient Rome, we are suffering from an irruption of barbarous nations. How shall we avoid Rome's fate?

The churches are rapidly exposing their follies to the world. The Protestant Bible societies are without funds.

The public school throws the only ray of hope upon our path. Let histories be banished from them; take the Catholic by the hand and say, "Nothing is taught here but pure science." After school visit your favorit library with your children, and let us not forget the geological search or the botanical ramble.

With regard to the Symposium, remember that stoical principles alone can save human nature from shipwreck. Freethinkers' colossal body of divinity is drawn from the best maxims of all ages, the only constructiv system known to the universe, while religion addresses itself to the weak side of human nature, credulity, and love of fanatical folly. The religious nostrums are labeled truth by the quack doctors who invented them. ALHAZA.

GRIDLEY, KAN., Feb. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that some of its readers are more or less bound down yet by that blighting and galling chain, superstition. By some you are admonished not to make any Bible pictures; others as much as say, "Woe be unto you if you do not head Heston off when he gets to the New Testament." I hav the utmost charity for all such, as I fully know from my own experience that we are not released instantaneously, and it requires much effort, nerve, and persistence, as well as education, to overcome this blighting curse. For my part, I am anxiously looking forward to the time when Brother Heston will hav an opportunity of trying his hand in the New Testament; as evidently it is there that illustrations will be most effectiv, simply for the reason that the masses are better read, or hav been in training more, from it than the Old. I inclose money to pay for three copies, to be sent as indicated per subjoined slip. We desire to organize a Liberal Sunday-school here. Please send catalog of such books as we may require.

Yours for morality and science, C. H. CUSTENBORDER.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Jan. 26, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $6 25 for credit on my subscription, a new subscriber, the ANNUAL, and books as named. The seventy-five cents remaining use for the pictures. I hav been a regular subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER from the first number. It has come up like the sun, fighting the dark, damp, unhealthy fogs of ignorance, religion, and night, and though long, bitter, and dreadful the struggle with all that the minions of the corrupt, manhood-and-womanhood-destroying church could command and bring to bear through fear and force, yet, like the sun, the paper is nearing the zenith, and the light and warmth of its love for truth, justice, and humanity is encircling the earth in a halo of knowledge, courage, and liberty, with all precious privileges to man, woman, and child. Every year loosens more and more the bonds of religious despotism. When I was a boy preachers were feared, and were called the "men of God." Now, they are seen and regarded in their true light as idlers and pirates, the common enemies of man. Within a few more years all ecclesiastical property will be taxed out of existence, and all idlers will be required to honestly earn a livelihood. P. V. WISE.

COMO, IND., Jan. 16, 290.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to our favorit journal, I will say that we hav tried fair and faithful for subscribers but hav failed to secure any. There seems to be a number of Liberal-minded people around these parts, but they are weak, or backward by some means. I think the pictures should be retained. As our minds become more acquainted with the progressiv age we find that we learn faster to hav some things shown up in a humorous way than by hard reasoning. And we also know their work to be one of much importance, as the system exposed contains so much foolishness. I remember reading a history of the United States a few years ago, and it spoke of the immense numbers of painted charts, maps, or scrolls that were found in Mexico at the time of its conquest by the Spaniards. They were held sacred by the nativs, but they were seized ruthlessly by their conquerors and publicly burnt in the public squares. It was afterward discovered, when too late, that it was their written history. I am of the opinion, with some of your correspondents, that in the near future you should fill up a neat volume with proper explanations on Heston's pictures, and they will make us a valuable little history. HENRY A. HARTLEY.

ADRIAN, MICH., Jan. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER exhibits a par value in nearly all its departments, especially the editorials. The illustrations admirably call attention to the folly of the ways of our antediluvian sires. I was showing to a lady relativ the beauties of Heston's art. She said that the Bible did not indulge in obscenities, as the pictures intimated. I reached up to my book-case and handed her "The Godly Women of the Bible," written by a well-known author, "The Ungodly Woman." I asked her to be kind enough to read it. She took it and went to the parlor. After a while she came back, cheeks red, eyes flaming, with the salutation, "Here, take your filthy literature! It is a slander on the Bible and a disgrace to your house." "Why so?" I remarked. "Why so?" she replied; "because it is a lie, and filthy." I said, "Long quotations in that book are taken from your holy Bible." "It is not true," she said. "Did you ever read the Bible?" "Why, yes, and there is no such passage in it." "Now, if you will take the book and your Bible and compare them, for every passage you find misquoted I will giv you $5, and for every corresponding quotation you shall giv me five cents." At first she would hav nothing to do with the book, but finally, to please me and to expose my folly, she consented. She worked at it a while and then went home. I inquired for the book. It was gone. Two or three days after she came into my room laughing, and said, "What did you think had become of the book?" I told her I knew she would not go without it. Finally she concluded the old Bible was a fraud and a mass of contradictions, and too vulgar for this age. I told her to pay up. "No," she declared, "I am humiliated enough now." She never belonged to any church, but trained with the Methodist Episcopal church; had read the Bible but little, and did not stop to consider. She is now a full-fledged Freethinker, and thinks I am not so wicked after all. Now she comes over to see the pictures. She will some day subscribe. It is too early yet. O. S. BARRETT.

A Touch of Nature.

A little maid upon my knee
Sighs wearily, sighs wearily;
"I'm tired out of dressin' dolls
And having stories read," says she.

"There is a book, if I could see,

My mamma keeps it on a shelf—
'But that you cannot hav,' says she!"

"But here's your 'Old Man of the Sea,'
And 'Jack the Giant!'" (Lovingly
I tried the little maid to soothe.)

"Is that high up one—seems to me
The fings you want just has to be Somefing you hasn't got, and that's
The interestin' one!" says she.

Misery and Her Pear Tree.

[The ingenious allegory below was selected for the Children's Corner by G. M. Davenport, who has our thanks for his kindness.

The story shows that however desirable long life may be, there comes a time when death is welcome, and, also, that misery is always in the world, which might not be the case, if all would be unselfish, and try to liv like true brothers and sisters, observing always the laws of health and morality.—ED. C. C.]

Many, many years ago, there lived in a small town in the Netherlands a poor old woman, called Misery, who begged from door to door. Mrs. Misery lived in a clay hut, with no companion but her dog Faithful, and with no possessions except her basket, which, alas, she often brought home at night quite empty. Oh! I forgot. She had one more piece of property, a pear-tree, such a pear-tree as had not been found on earth since our first parents lived in Eden, and the only joy of this poor woman was in eating its delicious fruit.

But the wicked boys! Misery liked to take her dog for company in her daily walks to the village, but in the autumn she was forced to leave him behind to guard her pear-tree.

Once the winter was uncommonly severe; it hailed and snowed continually, and the snow lay so deep that everyone suffered; Misery, most of all. One night the wind howled and the snow drifted, and as the poor old woman and her dog were sitting close together near the dying embers, a loud knock was suddenly heard at the door. Faithful, who usually barked furiously when anyone came, now whined softly, as if he was greatly pleased.

"For heaven's sake," cried a pitiful voice, "open the door to a poor man who is perishing with cold and hunger."

"Pull the latch," answered Misery. "Certainly I would not close my door against any one on such a night."

The stranger entered. He looked older and more forlorn than Misery herself, and wore a torn blue coat.

Misery was full of pity for him. "Now sit down, good man," she said. "You hav come to a very poor home, but, thanks to the good Lord, I can warm you."

She put all the dry twigs she had gathered on the fire, and then gave the stranger three morsels of bread and a pear—all she had. Soon the fire burnt bright and the old man ate with a good appetite, while Faithful licked his feet. When he had finished, Misery wrapped her old blanket around him and made him lie down on her little pallet, while she passed the night in her chair.

She awoke early next morning, and was just starting out with her basket to beg some food for the stranger's breakfast, when she saw him ready to start.

"What! you will go?" she said.

"My task is done," he answered. "I go to giv account to my master, for I am not what I seem; I am St. Nanon, the patron saint of this village, and our father has sent me to find out how the good Christians here practice charity, the first of all virtues. I hav knocked at the doors of the burgomaster of the citizens in the neighboring towns. I hav knocked at the doors of the farmers and peasants—all hav left me standing outside, cold and hungry. Thou alone hast been charitable, and yet thou art more miserable than I appear. The Lord will reward thee. Now make a wish and it shall be granted."

Poor Misery fell on her knees and said: "I no longer wonder that Faithful licked your feet; but I hav not done this thing for a reward, and, indeed, I need nothing."

"Thou art too miserable not to suffer want. Say, what dost thou wish?" asked St. Nanon.

Misery did not answer.

"A large farm, barns, and stables filled with grain and cattle? Riches? Honor? Shall I make thee countess or queen?"

Misery shook her head.

"A saint, with any self-respect, likes not to be under obligation to a poor old woman," he exclaimed. "Speak! or I must think thou refused out of pride."

"Well, as you insist, great Saint Nanon, I obey. In my garden is a pear-tree, with the most delicious fruit, but the wicked village boys steal them, unless I leave my good dog behind me to watch. Now grant that nobody who climbs into my tree can get down without my permission."

"Amen," said the good man, smiling at her simplicity. He then gave her his blessing and was gone.

This blessing brought Misery good fortune, and from that day she never came home empty-handed. Spring and summer came and went; then autumn was there. Pears ripened, and no sooner did the boys see Misery start out with her dog than they climbed the tree and filled their pockets with fruit. When they wanted to get down, however, they were held like mice in a trap.

At last Misery came home, and, after having let them cry a while, she kindly allowed them to run away, while Faithful barked at their heels. They never wished to come back, the villagers avoided the charmed tree, and Misery and her dog lived as happily as anyone can liv here below.

Toward the end of autumn, as Misery sat one day in her little garden enjoying the sun, she heard a voice call, "Misery! Misery! Misery!"

It was so hollow and sad a sound that the good woman began to tremble all over, and her dog howled piteously. She turned and beheld a tall, cadaverous-looking man, who carried a long scythe. Then Misery knew Death.

"What do you want, man of God?" she asked, with unsteady voice. "Why do you come to see me with a scythe?"

"I hav to do my work," he answered. "Come, Misery, thou must follow me."

"So early?"

"Early! thou oughtest to be thankful to me, thou who art so poor, so old, so shaking."

"I am by no means poor or old; I hav quite a provision of bread and fuel; at Christmas I shall be ninety-five only, and as to my being a little shaky, excuse me, Death, but really my legs, at least, are quite as straight as yours."

"Go, get ready, thou will be happier far in paradise."

"We know what we lose, but not what we gain by such a change," Misery replied. "Poor Faithful, too, would then be so unhappy."

"He may follow thee. Come, make up thy mind."

Misery sighed. "Grant me at least a few minutes that I may make myself nice and clean. I should not like to hav the people in the next world ashamed of me"

That Death allowed her. She put on the cotton dress that had been her best for thirty years, took her white straw hat and cloak, everything neat and whole, as if dressed for Christmas day.

While dressing she looked around for the last time in her poor little hut, at her dog Faithful, and at her pear-tree. Then so strange a thought came into her mind that she could not help laughing.

"Man of God, will you do me one favor while I am getting ready? Please go and pick the last three pears from my tree. We may need them on our journey."

"All right," he answered, and climbed into the tree. He gathered the pears, but was greatly astonished to find that he could not get down.

"Misery!" he cried out, "help me to jump down from this dreadful tree. I am sure it must be bewitched."

Misery came to the door and saw how Death, with his long legs and arms, was making frantic efforts to get down, but after he had succeeded a little, the tree took him once more, just as if it were alive, and pressed him in its wide, strong arms.

"Upon my word," said Misery, "I am in no haste to reach paradise. This world is plenty good enough for me for a while longer. You are nicely provided for, my fine fellow; stay where you are and the human race will owe me a debt of gratitude." So Misery closed the door and left old Death perched in the pear-tree.

At the end of a month everyone greatly wondered that not a single life had ended in the village and in the neighboring town, and this astonishment increased when people found out that the same was true throughout the country.

At the coming in of the new year the almanacs stated that the same wonder had been noticed all through France, Holland, Germany, Sweden, and Russia. Sick people recovered, and doctors, ignorant of the reason, took to themselvs the glory.

Another year passed and this state of things was celebrated with illuminations and all sorts of festivity. The feast lasted three days, and, no longer fearing gout, paralysis, or dyspepsia even, people ate and drank enormously as they had never dared to do before.

Misery alone understood the secret of all this happiness, but she, poor soul, was too modest to boast of it.

After ten, twenty, thirty years, however, people who had lingered blind, deaf, lame, and ill till they were one hundred and twenty years old, began to find out that length of days was not so great a blessing.

Not only so, but animals no longer died, so that the human race—that part of it at least depending upon meat for food and upon skins for clothing—suffered untold misery.

In Bondy, a little town not far from Misery's village, lived a doctor of prodigious learning, who spoke Latin chiefly, and was, therefore, called Dr. Profundis. He was a worthy gentleman, and in the good old time had sent many a soul into the world beyond. It grieved him to be no longer able to perform this kind office for the sufferers in his parish. One evening he had been playing whist with the burgomaster and lost his way while returning home through a swamp. As luck would hav it he came out in Misery's garden, where he heard a plaintiv voice cry out, "Oh, will nobody come to deliver me and to save the world from this longevity, which is a hundred times worse than the plague!"

Lifting his eyes, the learned doctor, wondering and delighted, recognized his old crony—Death.

"Is this indeed you, my old friend? What on earth are you doing in that pear-tree?"

"Nothing whatever, Dr. Profundis, and that is what makes me so unhappy. Reach up thy hand and help me down."

The good doctor no sooner reached his hand than he, too, was caught by the embracing branches, and his struggles to regain the ground were wholly unavailing.

Soon the doctor's disappearance created great excitement, and his fellow-townsmen turned out to search for him. Finally they discovered his footprints in the swamp, and, following them, came within hailing distance of the enchanted tree.

Catching sight of his friends the doctor shouted and waved his handkerchief, shouting, "This way, my friends! Here is death. Did I not tell you in my last pamphlet that he was in this swamp—the true cholera nest? But non possumus descendere. We cannot get down from this cursed tree."

"Long liv Death!" they all shouted, and fearlessly approached to extend their hands to the two prisoners. Alas! one after another was lifted and drew his would-be helper after him, and, strange to tell, the tree grew in proportion to its increasing burden. Others hastened up, and all together formed links to a long human chain. Those left on the ground ran for hatchets and hacked away at the trunk, hoping to fell it; but their powerful strokes made not the least impression, and despairingly they looked in each other's faces, knowing not what saint to invoke in their direful need.

At length Misery, who had grown very blind and deaf, was made to understand the mischief she had wrought, albeit unintentionally.

"I, alone," she cried, "can set Death free and make him a benefactor to the human race, and I will do it on one condition; he must not come for me or Faithful before I hav called three times."

"I agree to that," said Death.

"Come down then," spake Misery, and Death, the doctor, and all the others fell like ripe pears.

Death at once began work, sending off first those who were most clamorous. Finding that he had more than he could do, he called to his aid an army of physicians and appointed Dr. Profundis commander-in-chief. Then, with united strength, they established the old order. Whoever was older than a hundred years had a right to die, of which he thankfully availed himself. The only exception was Misery. Up to the present time she has not given Death his three calls, and that is why Misery is always with us on the earth.

Correspondence.

REEDS, MO., Feb. 10, E.M. 290.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote to the Children's Corner. I hav also changed my post-office address since then. I did not read my first letter until about a month or two ago. Well, I went to hear Mr. J. E. Remsburg lecture at Carthage, February 2d (Sunday). I was so used to hearing those sky-pilots howl around, that it seemed to me as if he belonged to that class. When it was time for him to commence (along about sundown), the church bells began to clang away, but Mr. Remsburg had an audience of about five hundred people, anyway. As I was going to the Opera House, and the bells began to ring, I thought to myself, if there is anything that will disturb the peace it is those infernal church bells. I cannot think of anything more to write, so I will close for this time. Yours respectfully,

CHAS. W. MCALESTER.

TERRE HAUTE, IND., Feb. 19, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will write you a letter for my first time.

I go to school and study arithmetic, history, physiology, bookkeeping, grammar, writing, and drawing. I am in No. 8. My teacher's name is Mr. Boyer. I never see any letters in the Children's Corner from Terre Haute. I liv with my uncle. I hav a piano and hav taken one term and a half of lessons on it. We were examined in physiology and history. I had one hundred in both. My uncle has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I can remember. I like to read the Children's Corner and look at the pictures on the back page. There is a church a half of a mile from our house. They hav a lady preacher. I will hav to close, hoping to see this in print. I would like to hav the girls of the Children's Corner write to me, and Miss Wixon too.

I remain a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a friend to all who read it.

CERVANTES makes Sancho Panza say: "Blessings light on him that first invented sleep! It covers a man all over, thoughts and all like a cloak; it is meat for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, heat for the cold and cold for the hot."

STOP a moment and think before using the words 'ought" and "should." Ought implies that we are morally bound to do something. Should is not quite so strong a term. We ought to be honest; we should be tender toward little children.
